

EDITORIAL

Donald Gordon And the Chateau Blunder

AS CHAIRMAN of the Wartime Prices and Trade Board Donald Gordon made himself a highly respected citizen by telling the public to go fly a kite. It was his simple duty to infuriate some of the people all of the time and all of the people some of the time. Because he was willing to risk extreme personal unpopularity—often among men of the greatest influence—he ended the war a popular man.

But perhaps it's time someone reminded Mr. Gordon that telling the public to fly a kite is not a virtue in itself. As president of the CNR, Mr. Gordon now heads a large corporation bought and paid for by the Canadian public and drawing almost all its operating revenue from the Canadian public in the form of taxes and individual payments for services rendered. It is no longer his duty to do what he thinks best for the public, whether the public likes it or not. It is no longer his right to ignore the feelings of the public.

In his plans for the new CNR hotel in Montreal, we believe Mr. Gordon has either misread or chosen to override the wishes of most of the hotel's owners and potential customers. We believe he has done so on two counts: in the choice of a name for the hotel and in the choice of its management.

Perhaps it is too late to call the hotel anything except the Queen Elizabeth. We've always felt it a doubtful mark of respect to borrow the names of our sovereigns for commercial enterprises; but to return the name once having borrowed would probably be considered even more offensive.

This does not make it any less unfortunate that thousands of Montrealers are still demanding that the new CNR hotel be called the Chateau Maisonneuve. The arguments for Chateau Maisonneuve are so compelling that it seems incredible they did not prevail in the beginning. Paul de Chomedey, Sieur de Maisonneuve, founded Montreal more than three hundred years ago, repeatedly risked his life to save the little settlement from extinction and is properly remembered as one of our nation's greatest men.

Nothing could be less appropriate than that the Queen's name be allowed to become the centre of a controversy about a hotel. Nevertheless, this has already happened and we think the CNR is largely responsible for allowing it to happen. The controversy can be ended with dignity in only one way—if the Queen's advisers ask her to withdraw assent to the use of her name. This we earnestly hope they will do at the earliest opportunity.

The CNR itself still has the power to correct what many people consider to be its second mistake in planning the Montreal hotel. This is the deal under which the United States hotel chain owned by Conrad Hilton will manage the hotel for the CNR, and of course take a share of the profits.

There has been considerable opposition, both in parliament and elsewhere, to this arrangement and we don't think it arises solely from chauvinism or wounded national pride. The CNR is spending twenty million dollars to build the hotel. Either it can or cannot run the hotel itself with maximum efficiency; if it can't operate a twenty-million-dollar hotel, it shouldn't be building a twenty-million-dollar hotel. Mr. Gordon argues that the Hilton chain will be able to bring the Montreal hotel a great deal of convention trade through its American chain. This may be so. But the CNR itself has been in the hotel business a very long time—quite a bit longer, if we are not mistaken, than Mr. Hilton. If its facilities for getting business are still so incomplete that it can't attract conventions to one of the three or four most exciting cities on the continent, then it should be building up its facilities not abandoning them.

Ralph Allen Editor
 Pierre Berton Managing Editor
 Leslie F. Hanson Associate Editor
 Blair Fraser Ottawa Editor
 Art Director: Gene Alliman, Assistant: Desmond English
 Assistant Editors: Fred Bodsworth, N. O. Bonisteel, Robert Collins, John Gray, Sidney Katz, W. R. Lusscombe, David MacDonald, Herbert Manning, McKenzie Parker, Ian Sclanders, Janice Tyrwhitt.
 Editorial Assistants: Joan Dory, Iain Morrison, Carol Lindsay, Joan Weatherhead.

Douglas M. Gowdy Manager
 Hall Linton Advertising Manager
 E. Wee Spicer Advertising Production Manager
 E. Douglas Myles Circulation Manager

Editorial, Circulation & Advertising Offices:
 481 University Avenue, Toronto 2, Canada

CONTENTS

Vol. 68 MAY 14, 1955 No. 10

Cover Painting by James Hill

Articles

WHAT'S BEHIND THE IMMIGRATION WRANGLE? Fred Bodsworth	11
DON'T LET THE CHILD EXPERTS SCARE YOU. Dr. D. C. Williams as told to Thomas Walsh THE IMPORTANCE OF BEING WEEL Norman J. Berrill	18
OTTAWA'S CHAMPION PENNY-PINCHER, Blair Fraser	20
SHOULD HUSBANDS AND WIVES TAKE SEPARATE HOLIDAYS? Robert Thomas Allen	22
HOW THE SEAWAY IS SWAMPING THE FRUIT- LANDS. Duncan McLeod	26
THE STRUGGLE FOR THE BORDER, Part Six, THE TWO PEERS WHO LAUNCHED THE COM- MONWEALTH. Bruce Hutchings	28
THE PANIC OVER HALLEY'S COMET, A Maclean's Flashback. Bill Stephenson	30
DON'T ANSWER THAT MARITAL QUIZ. Parker Cummings	34

Fiction

NOT THIS AUGUST, Part One, C. M. Kaschlich	14
OUR STRANGE STAY AT MISS PICKERING'S. Eileen Johnston Bussing	32

Departments

EDITORIAL	2
LONDON LETTER. Beverly Baxter	4
BACKSTAGE AT OTTAWA. Blair Fraser	6
HALLGAB	8
MACLEAN'S MOVIES. Rated by Clyde Gilmour	36
JASPER. Cartoon by Simpkins	38
POLICE CALLS. Paul Steiner	126
IN THE EDITORS' CONFIDENCE	131
PARADE	132

PHOTOGRAPHS IN THIS ISSUE

By—Miller Services (4), Star Newspaper Service (11, 12, 13), Capital Press (12, 13), Paul Harold (13), Cloud P. Derriff (13), C. M. Robbins (13), Peter Crydian (14, 15), Malak (22, 23), Ontario Department of Travel and Publicity (26), Hugh Robertson (26, 27), Bettman Archives (30), Yerkes Observatory (31).

NOT THIS

"Anyone on this street in three minutes will be shot," the Russian voice boomed. People dived for cover.

It was over. Russia had won World War III.
And the secret that could still save democracy was in the hands of a madman

PART ONE

AUGUST

By C. M. KORNBLUTH

ILLUSTRATED BY DON ANDERSON

"Not this August, nor this September; you have this year to do what you like. Not next August, nor next September; that is still too soon . . . But the year after that or the year after that they fight."

ERNEST HEMINGWAY, Notes on the Next War

APRIL 17th, 1965, the blackest day in the history of North America, started like any other day for Billy Justin. Thirty-seven years old, once a free-lance commercial artist, a pensioned veteran of Korea, he was now a dairy farmer, and had been during the three years of the war. It was that, or be drafted to a road crew—with great luck, a factory bench.

He rose, therefore, at 5.15, shut off his alarm clock and went, bleary-eyed in bathrobe and slippers, to milk his eight cows. He hefted the milk cans to the platform for the pickup truck of the Eastern Milkshed Administration and briefly considered washing out the milking machine and pails as he ought to. He then gave a disgusted look at his barn, his house, his fields—the things that once were supposed to afford him a decent, dignified retirement and had become instead vampires of his leisure—and shambled back to bed.

At the more urbane hour of ten he really got up and had breakfast, including an illegal egg withheld from his quota. Over unspcakably synthetic coffee he consulted the electricity bulletin tacked to his kitchen wall and sourly muttered: "Goody." Today was the day Chiung County rural residents got four hours of juice: 10.30 to 2.30.

The most important item was recharging his car battery. He vaguely understood that it ruined them to just stand when they were run down. Still in bathrobe and slippers he went to his sagging garage, unbolted the corroded battery terminals and clipped on the leads from the trickle charger that hung on the wall. Not that four hours of trickle would do a lot of good, he reflected, but maybe he could scrounge some tractor gas somewhere. Old Man Croley down in the store at Norton was supposed to have an arrangement with the Liquid Fuels Administration tank-truck driver.

Ten-thirty struck while he was still in the garage; he saw the needle on the charger dial kick over hard and heard a buzz. So that was all right.

Quite a few lights were on in the house. The last allotment of juice had come in late afternoon and evening, which made considerably more

Continued on next page

Old man Croley tacked up the notice. The town was under a curfew.

The menacing Russians blocked the road. Justin turned for home.

Captain Kirilov knew his stuff. Not a thing in the barn escaped him.

"After what you've done don't ever speak to me again!" Justin shouted.

NOT THIS AUGUST continued

sense than 10.30 to 2.30. Chingra County, N.Y., he decided after reflection, was getting the short end as usual.

The radio, ancient and slow to warm up, boomed at him suddenly: "Bring you all in your time of trial and striving, The Hour of Faith, Beloved sisters and brethren, let us pray, Almighty Father—"

Justin said without rancor: "Amen," and turned the dial to the other CONELRAD station. Early in the war that used to be one of the biggest of the nuisances: only two broadcast frequencies allowed instead of the old American free-for-all which would have guided bombers or missiles. With only two frequencies you had, of course, only two programs and frequently both of them stank. It was surprising how easily you forgot the early pique when Current Conservation went through and you rarely heard the programs.

He was pleased to find a newscast on the other channel.

"The Defense Department announced today that the fighting in Alberta continues to rage. Soviet units have penetrated to within three hundred yards of the American defense perimeter. Canadian armored forces are hammering at the flanks of their salient in a determined attack involving hundreds of Acheson tanks and 280-millimeter self-propelled cannon. The morale of our troops continues high and individual acts of heroism are too numerous to describe here.

"Figures released today indicate that the enemy on the home front is being as severely and as justly dealt with as the foreign invader to whom he pledges allegiance. A terse announcement from Lewisburg Federal Penitentiary included this report: 'Civilians executed for treason during the six-month period just ending—784.' From this reporter to the FBI, a hearty 'Well done!'

"The Attorney-General's Office issued a grim and pointed warning today that the Harboring of Deserters Act means precisely what it says and will be enforced to the letter. The government will seek the death penalty against eighty-seven-year-old Mrs. Arthur Schwartz of Chicago who allegedly gave money and food to her grandson, Pte. William O. Temple, as he was passing through Chicago after deserting under fire from the United States Army. Temple, of course, was apprehended in Windsor, Ontario, on March 17 and shot.

"Good news for candy lovers! The Nonessential Foodstuffs Agency reports that a new substitute chocolate has passed testing and will soon be available to B-card holders at all groceries. It's just two points for a big, big, half-ounce bar! From this reporter to the hard-working boys and girls of the NFA, a hearty—"

Justin, a little nauseated, snapped the set off. It was time to walk up to his mailbox anyway. He hoped to hitch a ride on into Norton with the postwoman. The connecting rod of his well pump had broken and he was getting sick of hoisting up his water with a bucket. Old Man Croley might have a rod or know somebody who'd make him one.

He dressed quickly and sloppily, and didn't even think of shaving. "How are you fixed for blades?" wasn't much of a joke by then. He puffed up the steep quarter mile to his box and leaned on it, scanning the winding black top to the north from which she would come. He understood that a new girl had been carrying the mail for ten days or so, and wondered what had happened to Mrs. Elkins—fat, friendly, Continued on page 42

This was the satellite that could save the world. Now it was Justin's

Not This August

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 17

unkept Mrs. Elkins who couldn't add and whose mailbox notes in connection with postage due and stamps and money orders purchased were marvels of illegibility and confusion. He hadn't seen the new girl yet, nor had there been any occasion for notes between them.

DEEP in the cloudless blue sky to the north there was a sudden streak of white scribbled across heaven—condensation trail of a stratosphere guided missile. The wild jogs and jolts meant it was set for evasive action. Not very interested, he decided that it must be a Soviet job trying just once more for the optical and instrument shops of Corning, or possibly the fair-sized air-force base at Elmira. Launched, no doubt, from a Russian or Chinese carrier somewhere in the Atlantic. But as he watched Continental Air Defense came through again. It almost always did. Half a dozen thinner streaks of white soared vertically from nowhere, bracketed the heavy, and then there was a golden glint of light up there that meant "mission accomplished." Those CAD girls were good, he appreciatively thought. Too bad about Hamilton and Pittsburgh, but they were green then.

He sighed with boredom and shaded his eyes to look down the black top again. What he saw made him blink incredulously. A kiddycar going faster than a kiddycar should—or a magnified roller skate—but with two flailing pistons—

The preposterous vehicle closed up to him and creaked to a stop, and was suddenly no longer preposterous. It was a neatly made three-wheeled wagon steered by a tiller bar on the front wheel. The power was supplied by a man in khaki who alternately pushed two levers connected to a crankshaft which was also the rear axle of the cart. The man had no legs below his thighs.

He said cheerfully to Justin: "Need a farm hand, mister?"

Justin, manners completely forgotten, could only stare.

The man said: "I get around in this thing all right and it gives me shoulders like a bull. He surprised what I can do. String fence, run a tractor if you're lucky, ride a horse if you ain't, milk, cut wood, housework—and besides, who else can you get, mister?"

He took out a hunk of dense, homemade bread and began to chew on it. Justin said slowly: "I know what you mean, and I'd be very happy to hire you if I could, but I can't. I'm just snake-hipping through the Farm-or-Fight Law with eight cows. I haven't got pasture for more and I can't buy grain, of course. There just isn't work for another pair of hands or food for another mouth."

"I see," the man said agreeably. "There anybody around here who might take me on?"

"Try the Shiptons," Justin said. "Down this road, third house on the left. It used to be white with green shutters. About two miles. They're always moaning about they need help and can't get it."

"Thanks a lot, mister. I'll call their bluff. Would you mind giving me a push off? This thing starts hard for all it runs good once it's going."

"Wait a minute," Justin said almost angrily. "Do you have to do this? I mean, I tremendously admire your spirit, but damn it, the country's supposed to see that you fellows don't have to break your backs on a farm!"

"Spirit, hell," the man grinned. "No offense, but you farmers just don't know."

"Isn't your pension adequate? My God, it should be. For that."

"It's adequate," the man said. "Three hundred a month—more'n I ever made in my life. But I got good and sick of the trouble collecting it. Skipped months, get somebody else's cheque, get the cheque but they forgot to sign it. And when you get the right cheque with the right amount and signed right, you got four-five days wait at the bank standing in line. I figured it out and wrote 'em they could cut me to a hundred so long as they paid it in silver dollars. Got back a letter saying my bid for twenty-five gross of chrome-steel forgings was satisfactory and a contract letter would be forthcoming. I just figured things are pretty bad, they might get worse, and I want to be on a farm when they do, if they do. No offense, as I say, but you people don't know how good you have it. No cholera up here for instance, is there?"

"Cholera? Good God, no!"

"There—you see? Mind pushing me off now, mister? It's hot just sitting here."

Justin pushed him off. He went twinkling down the road, left-hand-right-hand-left-hand-right—

Cholera?
He hadn't even asked the man where New York, Boston? But he got the Sunday Times every week—

THE POSTWOMAN drove up in a battered '54 Buick. She was young and pretty, and she was obviously scared stiff to find a strange unshaven man waiting for her at a stop.

"I'm Billy Justin," he hastily explained through the window lowered a crack. "One of your best customers, even if I did forget to shave. Anything for me today?"

She poked his copy of the Times through the crack, smiled nervously and shifted preparatory to starting.

"Please," he said, "I was wondering if you'd do me a considerable favor. Drive me in to Norton?"

"I was told not to," she said. "Deserters, shirkers—you never know."
"Ma'am," he said, "I'm an honest dairyman, redeemed by the Farm-or-Fight Law from a life of lucrative shams as a commercial artist. All I have to offer is gratitude and my sincere assurance that I wouldn't bother you if I could possibly make it there and back on foot in time for the milking."

"Commercial artist?" she asked.
"Well, I suppose it's all right." She smiled and opened the door.

It was four miles to Norton, with a stop at every farmhouse. It took an hour. He found out that her name was Betty Cardew. She was twenty. She had been studying physics at Cornell, which exempted her from service except for IHWTC courses.

"Why not admit it?" she shrugged. "I finked out. It is nonsense my tackling physics in the first place, but my father insisted. Well, he found out he couldn't buy brains for me, so here I am."

She seemed to regard "here"—in the driver's seat of a rural free-delivery car, one of the cushiest jobs going—as a degrading, uncomfortable place.

He snapped his fingers. "Cardew," he said. "T. C.?"

"That's my pop."
And that explained why Betty wasn't in the WAC or the CAD or a labor battalion sewing shirts for soldiers. T. C. Cardew lived in a colonial mansion on a hill, and he was a National Committeeman. He shopped in Scranton or New York but he owned the ground on which almost every store in

"We are defeated," the President said.
"What's this?" Justin shouted. "A gag?"

Chiung County stood.

"Hetty," he said tentatively, "we haven't known each other very long, but I have come to regard you with reverent affection. I feel toward you as a brother. Don't you think it would be nice if Mr. T. C. Cardew adopted me to make it legal?"

She laughed sharply. "It's nice to hear a joke again," she said. "But frankly you wouldn't like it. To be blunt, Mr. T. C. Cardew is a skunk. I had a nice mother once, but he divorced her."

He was considerably embarrassed. After a pause he asked: "You been in any of the big cities lately? New York? Boston?"

"Boston last month. My plane from Ithaca got forced into the northbound traffic pattern and the pilot didn't dare turn. We would've gone down on the CAD screen as a bogey, and wham! The ladies don't ask questions first any more. Not since Hamilton and Pittsburgh."

"How was Boston?"

"I just saw the airport. The usual thing—beggars, wounded, garbage in the streets. No flies—too early in the year."

"I have a feeling that we in the country don't know what's going on outside our own little milk routes. I also have a feeling that the folks in Boston don't know about the folks in New York and vice versa."

"Mr. Justin, your feeling is well-grounded," she said emphatically. "The big cities are hellholes because conditions have become absolutely unbearable and still people have to bear them. Did you know New York's under martial law?"

"No?"

"Yes. The 104th Division and the 33rd Armored Division are in town. They're needed in Edmonton, but they were yanked south to keep New York from going through with a secession election."

He almost said something stupid ("I didn't read about it in the Times") but caught himself. She went on: "Of course; I shouldn't be telling you the state secrets, but I've noticed at home that a state secret is something known to everybody who makes more than fifty thousand a year and to nobody who makes less. Don't you feel rich now, Mr. Justin?"

"Filt'y rich. Don't worry, by the way. I won't pass anything on to anybody."

"Hess you, I know that! Your mail's read, your phone's monitored and your neighbors are probably itching to collect a bounty on you for turning you in as a D-or-S." A D-or-S was a "disaffected or seditious person"—not quite a criminal and certainly not a full-fledged citizen. He usually found himself making camouflage nets behind barbed wire in Nevada, never fully realizing what had hit him.

"You're a little rough on my neighbors. Nobody gets turned in around here for shooting off his mouth. It's still a small corner of America."

"Insanely dangerous to be talking like that. Sometimes he liked over to the truck farm of his friends the Bradens, also city exiles, and they had sessions into the small hours that cleared their minds of gripes intolerably accumulated like pus in a boil. Amy Braden's powerful home-brew helped...

Rumble-rumble, they rolled over the Lehigh's tracks at the Norton grade crossing; Croley's store was dead ahead at the end of the short main street. Norton, New York, had a population of about sixty people and no young ones. Since a few brief years of glory a century and a half ago as a major riverboat town on the Susquehanna it had been running down. But somehow Croley made a store there pay.

She parked neatly and handed him a big sheaf of mail. "Give these to the Great Stone Face," she said, "I don't like to look at him."

"Thanks for the ride," he said. "And the talk."

She flashed a smile. "We must do it more often," and drove away.

Immediately, thinking of his return trip, he canvassed the cars and wagons lined up before Croley's. When he recognized Gus Feinblatt's stake wagon drawn by Tony and Phony, the two big geldings, he knew he had it made. Gus was that fantastic rarity, a Jewish farmer, and he lived up the road from Justin.

The store was crowded, down to the tip of its ell. Everybody in Norton was there, standing packed in utter silence. Croley's grim face swiveled toward him as he entered; then the storekeeper nodded at a freezer compartment where he could sit.

Justin wanted to yell: "What is this, a gag?"

Then the radio, high on a shelf, spoke. As it spoke Justin realized that it had been saying the same thing for possibly half an hour, over and over again but that people stayed and listened to it over and over again, mumbly waiting for somebody to cry: "Hoax" or "Get away from that mike, you dirty Red" or anything but what it would say.

The radio said: "Ladies and gentlemen, the President of the United States." Then the inimitable voice, but weary, deathly weary. "My fellow Americans. Our armed forces have met with terrible defeat on land and at sea. I have just been advised by General Fraley that he has unconditionally surrendered the Army of the Northwest to Generals Novikov and Feng. General Fraley said the only choice before him was surrender or the annihilation of his troops to the last man by overwhelmingly superior forces. History must judge the wisdom of his choice; here and now I can only say that his capitulation removes the last barrier to the southward advance of the armies of the Soviet Union and the Chinese People's Republic.

"My fellow citizens, I must now tell you that for three months the United States has not possessed a fleet in being. It was destroyed in a great air-sea battle off the Azores, a battle whose results it was thought wisest to conceal temporarily.

"We are disarmed. We are defeated. I have by now formally communicated the capitulation of the United States of America to the USSR and the Chinese to our embassy in Switzerland where it will be handed to the Russian and Chinese embassies.

"As Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces of the United States I now order all officers and enlisted men and women to cease fire. Maintain discipline, hold your ranks, but offer no opposition to the advance of the invading armies; for resistance would be a futile waste of lives—and an offense for which the invading armies might retaliate tenfold. You will soon be returned to your homes and families in an orderly demobilization. Until then, maintain discipline. You were a great fighting force, but you were outnumbered.

"To the civilians of the United States I also say maintain discipline. Your task is the harder, for it must be self-discipline. Keep order. Obey the laws of the land. Respect authority. Make no foolish demonstrations. Comport yourselves so that our conquerors will respect us.

"Beyond that, I have no advice to give. The terms of surrender will reach me in due course and will be immediately communicated to you. Until then, may God bless you all and stay you in this hour of trial."

"There was a long pause, and the radio said: "Ladies and gentlemen, the President of the United States."

"My fellow Americans. Our armed forces have met with . . ."

Justin looked around him incredulously and saw that most of them were silently crying.

II

ALONG about one o'clock people began to drift dazedly from the store—to their homes in Norton, to talk in stunned whispers on the board sidewalk fronting the grocery. Old Man Croley turned the radio off when a girl's voice said between replays of the surrender statement that there would be a new announcement broadcast at 9 p.m. for which electric current restrictions would be temporarily relaxed.

"That'll be the surrender terms," Gus Feinblatt said to Justin. "I guess so. Gus—what do you think?"

"There were four thousand years of dark history in Feinblatt's eyes. "I think the worst is yet to come, Billy."

"You'll get your kids back." "At such a price. I don't know whether it's worth it . . . Well, life goes on. Mr. Croley?"

The storekeeper looked up. He didn't say "Yes?" or "What can I do for you?" He never did; he looked and he waited and he never called anybody by name. He wasn't an old-timer—old-timers went in Norton; he had come ten years ago from a grocery in Minnesota, and had used those ten years well. Justin knew he sold hardware, fencing, coal, fuel oil, fertilizer, feed and seed—in short, everything a farmer needed to earn his living—as well as groceries. Justin suspected that he also ran a small private bank which issued loans at illegal rates of interest. He did know that there were farmers who turned pale when Croley looked speculatively at them, and farm wives who cursed him behind his back. He was sixty-five, civil-looking and married to an ailing thin woman who spent most of her time in the apartment above the store.

"Mr. Croley," Gus said, "I might as well get my feed. My wagon's outside the storeroom."

Croley put out his hand and waited. Gus had twenty-seven dollars in it, and still the hand was out, waiting. "Coupons?" Gus asked warily.

"You heard him," Croley said. "After a moment you figured out that "him" was the President, who had said that civilians were to continue as before, maintaining order.) (Gus tore coupons out of his F book and laid them on the money. The hand was withdrawn and Croley stumped outside to unlock the storeroom door and stand by, watching, as Feinblatt and Justin loaded sacks of feed onto the stake wagon. When the last one went bump on the bed he relocked the door, turned and went back into his grocery.

"Gus," Justin said, "would you mind waiting a minute? I want to see if Cro-

C. M. Kornbluth, young author of Not This August, wrote his first novel while serving as a gunner in the U.S. Army in Europe. This new book will be published later in hard covers by Doubleday and Company.

ley happens to have a pump rod for me—and then I'd like to bum a ride home from you."

"Glad to have your company," Feinblatt said, politely attracted.

The old skunk knew, of course, that Justin had used up his quarterly allotment of hardware coupons to fix his milker. Justin paid, red-faced with anger, and went out to climb alongside Feinblatt on the wagon. Gus clucked at the horses and they moved off.

Rumble-rumble over the Lehigh tracks and up Straw Hill Road, with Tony and Phony pulling hard on the stiff grade, the wagon wheels crushing into three years of unfixed chuck holes. Halfway up Feinblatt called "Whoa" and fixed the brake. "Rest 'em a little," he said to Justin. "All they get's hay, of course. Feed has to go to the cows. How's your herd?"

"All right, I guess," Justin said. "I wonder if I can let 'em go now? You want to buy them? I guess I don't get drafted for a road gang now if I stop farming."

"Think again," Feinblatt said. "My guess is you better stick to exactly what you've been doing. Things are going to keep on this way for a while—maybe quite a while. You know about the postal service in the Civil War?"

Feinblatt was the local Civil War fanatic; every community seemed to have one. They spent vacations touring the battlefields ecstatically, comparing the ground with the maps. They had particular heroes among the generals and they loved to guess at what would have happened if this successful rod had failed, if that disastrous skirmish had been a triumph.

"Lincoln called for volunteers," Gus Feinblatt said impressively. "Carolina fired on Fort Sumter. The war was on. And yet for months there was no interruption of the U. S. Mail between the two countries. Inertia, you call it. So maybe even if there isn't any war left to fight now, maybe even if the Reds kick the President and Congress out of Underground D.C., there will still be people on the state and local level to enforce drafting you for labor if you quit farming." He released the brake and clucked to the horses. The hay geldings strained up the hill again.

"I guess you're right," Justin said reluctantly. "Things won't be squared away for a long while. I guess after things get settled they replace government people with Reds, if they can find enough." He laughed unpleasantly. "Wait and see what happens to that snake Croley then! If ever there was anybody who qualified in the Commie book as a dirty capitalist exploiter it's our buddy down in Norton."

Feinblatt shrugged. "He made his bed. When I think my boys were fighting for him . . ." He spat over the side of the wagon, his face flushed.

"What do you hear from them?" Justin hastily asked. He had stopped one in Korea, but was guiltily aware that there was a keener agony of war that he had never known—the father's agony.

"Card from Daniel last week. Infantry Replacement Training Center in Montana. He was just finishing his basic. We worked out a kind of code, so I know he was hoping they wouldn't sign him north as a rifleman, but he thought they might. He was bucking for 75-millimetre recoilless gunner. It would have kept him on ice for another two weeks. From David not a word since he joined the 370th at Edmond. I don't know, Billy. I just don't know. It's over, sure, they'll come back maybe, but I don't know . . ."

"There was little more talk from them on." "Here's where I get off," Justin said at last. "My best to Leah." He swung down at his mailbox and limped down the steep hill to his house. May be able to get some decent shoes after things settle down, he thought bitterly. That'll be something.

IT STILL did not seem real. Obviously things were badly disorganized somewhere. The house lights kept going on and off; the phone rang his number now and then, but when he answered there was only the open-circuit hum of a broken line. He couldn't call anybody himself. He had a useless electric clock on the mantel which told him that the electric service was going badly off the beam. He timed the second hand with his watch and discovered that the alternating current delivered to his house was wobbling between 28 and 120 cycles per second instead of floating at an even 60 per. A bomb at Niagara? Fighting for a power substation somewhere? Engineers quitting their posts in despair?

But the Eastern Milkshed Administration truck had picked up his milk cans while he was gone. He herded his cows into the barn, belatedly washed the milker and pails, and relieved their full udders once more. God alone knew whether the milk would ever reach (cholera-ridden?) New York City, but the mail would go through. The RMA truckdriver would report him if there were no cans to pick up and the administrative machinery of a nation that was no longer alive would grind him through the gears into a road-mending crew whether it mattered a damn or not.

Once during the afternoon somebody good at the local radio station which was rebroadcasting the message of capitulation. A woman's voice screamed hysterically: "Rally, Americans! Fight the godless Reds! Fight them in the streets, from behind bushes, house to house—" And then, whoever she was, somebody dragged her away from the mike and said wearily: "We regret the interruption of our service due to circumstances beyond our control." Then, again: "Ladies and gentlemen, the President of the United States."

"My fellow Americans. Our armed forces have met with . . ."

The current went off again, this time for an hour.

There was a calm, slow knock on the door. Through the kitchen window Justin recognized Mister, sometimes the Reverend Mister Sparhawk. Sparhawk happened to be the last man on earth whom he wanted to see at the moment. He also happened to be a man practically impossible to insult, completely impervious to hints, maddeningly certain of his righteousness.

Justin sighed and opened the door. "Come on in," he told the lean old man. "Just, for God's sake, don't talk. Find something to eat and go away." He opened his breadbox and retreated into the living room hoping he wouldn't be pursued. Sparhawk was a ref, an Englishman. Justin was sick of refs, and so was everybody. The refs from the Baltic, the Balkans, Germany, France, England, Latin America—he vaguely felt that they ought to have stayed in their countries and been exterminated instead of bothering Americans. English refs were the least obnoxious, they didn't jabber, but Sparhawk . . .

The lean old man came into the living room eating bread and cheese. "Back up, m'boy," Sparhawk said cheerily. "All this is only a trial, you know. You should regard it as a magnificent opportunity. Here's your chance to play the man, acquire merit and get a leg up on your next incarnation."

"Oh, shut up," Justin said. "Natural reaction, very. I don't blame you a bit, m'boy. But sober reflection on the great events of this day will show you their spiritual meaning. How else would your haughty Americans get the chance to humble yourselves and practice asceticism if there were no Red occupation?"

Justin studied Sparhawk's neatly pressed garb, a collection of donated items in good repair. He snapped: "If you're so damned ascetic why don't you go around in a jockstrap like your beloved yugs?"

Sparhawk stiffened ever so slightly. "My dear young man," he said, "anybody who wore only a loin cloth in your atrocious climate might or might not be a saint, but he'd certainly be a bloody fool. I see you're in no mood for serious discussion, sir. I'll be you good day."

"Good riddance," Justin muttered, but only after Sparhawk had shouldered his rucksack, again and was going down the kitchen steps.

AT ABOUT seven in the evening Justin decided to visit his friends the Bradens, a mile and a half up the battered road. He hadn't seen much of them during the winter: his meagre gas allotment had been cut to zero in the general reduction of November, 1964. He had missed them personally, missed their offbeat chatter and Amy's generously shared home-brew. The only other liquor in the area was a vicious grape brandy illegally distilled by old Mr. Komrad on Ash Hill Road. It put you under fast. The next morning you wished you could die.

Low Braden had a weird profession. He was a maker of fine hand-laid papers for bookbinders and etchers. Before the war it was his custom to tour the country each summer in a battered Ford offering piousness prices to farm wives for their soft old linen tablecloths and napkins, washed thousands of times, worn to rags and stored thriftily in an attic trunk. He would finish his tour with boxes of the inimitable material and spend the winter turning it, with the aid of simple tools, dexterity and a great deal of know-how, into inimitable special-purpose papers. The Braden watermark was internationally famous—to about five hundred bookbinders and etchers—and he cleared perhaps three thousand dollars in an average year. It was, he often said nostalgically, a very easy buck. Under the Farm-or-Fight Law he and Amy had elected to start a pigery and truck farm for the reason that it required less effort than dairying or field crops. They turned out to be right. They had sailed through three years of war without much trouble, with time to read, paint, play violin-piano duets and drink. Justin, chained to the twice-daily milking and the nagging hygiene of the milk house, envied their good sense.

"Under the Articles of Surrender," the radio said, "the President and Vice-President were shot to death at 8 p.m."

Good sense, he thought, picking his way around the chuck holes in the moonlit road—maybe they can explain to me what the devil has happened and what happens next.

The countryside was waking on and off in the dusk like a Christmas tree. The Horbath farm up the hill, the Parry farm to the south with its big yard light, his own house behind him, alternately flared with lights in every window and then went out. He hoped the current would steady down by nine—time for "the further announcement."

Lew Braden suddenly called as he entered their dark yard: "Who's there? I've got a shotgun!"

"It's Justin," he called back. The yard light went on and stayed on. Braden studied him with mild perplexity. "Darned if you aren't," he said. "Come in, Billy. We were hoping somebody'd drop by. What's going on with the lights and the phone?"

"You haven't heard?"

"Obviously not. Come in and tell us about it, whatever it is. Nobody's been by and the radio won't go since Amy fixed it."

The radio was indeed roaring unintelligibly on an end table.

"It's over," Justin said. "That's what it's all about. Fraley surrendered at Edmonton. The President capitulated through the embassies in Switzerland. They've been broadcasting it since noon. Let me see that damned radio. It sounds as if you just haven't got it on a station."

He pulled the chassis out of the plastic case and saw the trouble. The cord from the tuning-knob pulley to the variable condenser was slack instead of taut; the radio worked but you couldn't tune it from the knob. He picked up a stub of pencil and shoved the condenser over to one of the CONELRAD stations.

"—in Chief of the Armed Forces of the United States I now order all officers and enlisted men to cease fire. Maintain discipline, hold your ranks—"

They listened to it twice through and then turned it down. Between each of the replays now the woman's voice announced that a further statement would be made at nine.

Lew and Amy were looking at each other. The expression on their faces was unreadable. At last Lew turned to Justin and said softly: "Don't worry about a thing, Billy. You're going to have to make a big readjustment in your thinking, but so will almost everybody. You'll find out you've been fed a pack of lies. You'll fight the truth at first, but finally we'll prove to you . . ."

"We? Who's we?" Justin demanded.

"Shut up, Lew," Amy said briefly. He turned his kindly, round, bespectacled face to her. "No, Amy. You too are having difficulty in readjusting. Conditions have changed now; we're suddenly no longer conspirators but the voice and leadership of America. A new America."

Guilelessly he turned again to Justin: "We're Communists, Billy. Have been for twenty years. This is the grandest day of my life."

Justin felt an impulse to back away. "You're kidding. Or crazy?"

"Neither one, Billy. You see, this is the first of the readjustments you will have to make. You think a Communist must necessarily be a fiend, a savage, a foreigner. You couldn't conceive of a Communist being a soft-spoken, reasonable, manly person. But Amy and I are, aren't we. And we're Communists. When I was on those linen-buying trips I was doubling as a courier. I was in the Party category you call 'floaters' then. Since the war I've been what you call a 'sleeper.' No conspiratorial activity, no connection with the activist branch. I have merely been under orders to hold myself in readiness for this day. I know who lives hereabouts,

I know their sentiments. I am, I think, almost everybody's friend. My job will be to educate the people of this area.

"You see? Your education is beginning already. There will be no brutal, foreign tyrants around here. There will be Amy and me—friends and neighbors, just the way we always were, explaining to you the new America.

"And what an America it will be! Freed from the shackles of capitalist exploitation and racial hatred! Purged of the warmongers who imposed a crushing armament burden on the workers and finally guided the USSR and the Chinese into attacking! An America freed from bondage to ancient superstition!"

There were tears of joy in his eyes. Justin asked slowly: "Have you spied? Have you been traitors?"

Lew said with dignity: "You're thinking of cloak-and-dagger stuff, Billy. Assassination. Break open the locked drawer and steal the great atomic secret for godless Russia. Well, there was a little melodrama, but I never liked it. I've risked my life more than once and I was glad to. Amy and I were couriers in the Rosenberg's apparatus; drawings from Los Alamos passed through our hands. It was only by a fluke that the FBI didn't stumble onto us. If they had, I suppose we would have died with the Rosenbergs. Gladly. For America, Billy. Because I did not spy against the people. I did not commit treason against the people."

Justin said: "Good night, Lew. Good night, Amy. I don't know what to think . . ."

Lew said confidently to his back: "You'll readjust. It'll be all right. Don't worry."

HE WALKED home and found that the current was on again apparently for good. He climbed to the attic and brought down a half-gallon of old Mr. Konrad's popskull. He filled a tumbler and sipped at it until nine, when the radio said:

"Ladies and gentlemen, the Secretary of State."

"Fellow citizens, I have been ordered to communicate to you the Articles of Surrender which were signed in Washington, D.C., today by the President on behalf of the United States, by Marshal Ilya Novikov on behalf of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and by Marshal Peng Teh on behalf of the Chinese People's Republic.

"One. The United States surrenders without conditions to the Soviet Union and China. Acts of violence against troops of the Soviet Union and China on or after April 17, 1965, are recognized by the high contracting parties as criminal banditry and terrorism, subject to summary and on-the-spot punishment.

"Two. The high contracting parties recognize and admit the criminal guilt of the United States in provoking the late war and recognize and admit the principle that the United States is liable to the Soviet Union and China for indemnities in valuta and kind.

"Three. The high contracting parties recognize and admit the personal criminal war guilt of certain civilians and soldiers of the United States and recognize and admit that these persons are subject to condign punishment."

The Secretary's voice shook. "I have been further asked to announce that the central functions of the United States Federal Government were assumed today by Soviet Military Government Unit 101, which today arrived by air in Washington, D.C., under the escort of two Russian and two Chinese airborne divisions.

"I have been further asked to announce that under Article Three of the Articles of Surrender I read you, the President and Vice-President of the United States were shot to death at 8 p.m. by a mixed Russian and Chinese firing squad."

That was all. Justin's hand was trembling so the raw brandy stopped over the tumbler's edge.

III

APRIL 23, 1965, sixth day of the defeat . . .

Justin leaned on his mailbox chimes for Betty Cardou, his morning cheer behind him, and reflected that things had gone with amazing smoothness. Nor was there any particular reason why they shouldn't. Soviet Military Government Unit 101 had certainly been planned and readied for twenty years. The Baltic states, the Balkans, Poland, Czechoslovakia, East Germany, West Germany, France, Italy, Spain and England—they had been precise rehearsals for the main event.

And what a main event! Half the world's steel, coal and oil. All the world's free helium gas. Midwest grain, northwest timber and the magnificent road net to haul them to magnificent ports. Industrial New England, shabby streets and dingy factories, but in the dingy factories the world's biggest assemblage of the world's finest precision tools. Detroit! South Bend! Prizes that made all the loot of all the conquerors of history flashy junk, SMGU 101 would not let the plunder slip through its fingers. It was moving fast, moving smoothly.

For the greatest part of the loot, the part without which the materials would be worthless, consisted of 160 million Americans. They knew how to extract that steel, coal, oil and gas, harvest the grain, log the forests, drive the trucks, load the freighters, run the lathes and punch presses.

Betsy Cardew had yesterday delivered to him—and to everybody on her route—SMGU Announcement Number One. So Gus Feinblatt was right. They turned over a carload of SMGU announcements to the Postmaster, D.C., with the note "one to each address" and it was automatic from there. The carload was broken down by regions, states, counties, towns, rural routes, and three days later everybody had one in his hand.

They hadn't been using radio. When current was on, and it was on more and more frequently as the days went by, all you heard was light classical music, station breaks and the time.

The SMGU announcement didn't come to much. It was simply a slanted recap of the military situation, larded with praise of General Friley and his troops, expressing gentle regret that so many fine young men and women had been lost to both sides. As an after-thought it stated: "The nationalization of all fissionable material is hereby proclaimed, and all Americans are notified that they must turn in any private stores of uranium, thorium or plutonium, either elemental or combined, to the nearest representative of the USSR or China at once."

Justin decided the first announcement must have been a test shot to find out how well the distribution would work. Its message certainly was pointless.

Betsy Cardew pulled up in the battered car. Lew and Amy Braden were in the back. She said: "No mail today, Billy. Do you want a ride in? Mr. and Mrs. Braden here were first, but there's room."

"Thanks," he said, and got in. He couldn't think of one word to say to his former friends, but they had no such trouble.

"I've been called to Chiunga Center," Lew said importantly. Chiunga Center was the town theravocate twenty thousand people in a bend of the Susquehanna, served by the Lehigh and the Lackawanna. "Advance units have reached the town."

"Yesterday," Betsy said. "A regiment, I guess, in trucks. Very GI, very Russian, very much on their good behavior. They're barracked in the Junior High. They set up a mess tent on the campus and strung barbed wire. Nine o'clock curfew in town and patrol with tommy guns. So far, everything's quiet. A couple of kids threw rocks." She laughed abruptly. "I saw it. I thought the sergeant was going to cut them in half with his tommy gun but he didn't. He took down their pants and spanked them."

"Smart cooky," Lew said gravely from the back of the car. "He played it exactly right."

"So," said Betsy, "there I am in the post-office sorting room busy sorting and in march six of them, polite as you please, and say through the window: 'Ve wish to see the postmaster' and old Flanagan comes tottering out ready to die like a man. So they hand him six letters. 'Plis to expedite delivery of these. Mr. Postmaster,' they say and salute him, and go away. And one of the letters is for Mr. and Mrs. Braden here and they won't tell me what it's all about, but they don't look like a couple going to their doom and I'm too well-trained a postal employee to pry."

Her flow of chatter was almost hysterical and Justin thought he knew why. It was the hysteria of relief, the discovery that The Awful Thing, the thing you dreaded above all else, has happened and isn't too bad after all. Chiunga Center was occupied, taken, conquered, seized—and life went on after all, and you felt a little foolish over your earlier terror. The Russians were just GIs, and weren't you a fool to think they had horns?

"You see?" Lew Braden said to nobody in particular.

"What I think," Betsy chattered, "is that they're just as dumb as any army men anywhere. You know what the first poster they stuck up said? 'Turn in your uranium and plutonium at once. The dopes!' The second notice covered pistols, rifles, shotguns and bayonets. That touch of idiosyncy is almost cute. Bayonets!"

They had reached State Highway 19 and stopped; Norton lay dead ahead and Chiunga Center was fourteen miles to the right on the highway. A convoy of trucks marked with the red star was rolling westward at maybe thirty-five. They were clean, well-maintained trucks and they were full of Russian soldiers in Class A uniforms. They caught a snatch of mournful harmony and the rhythmic nasal drone of a concertina.

"My Lord!" Betsy said. "They really do sing all the time. And in minor fifths. I thought they were putting it on at the mess tent, impressing the Americans with their culture and soul, but there isn't any audience here."

The last of the convoy, a couple of slum-guns, field kitchens like any army's field kitchens complete to the fat personnel, rolled past and Justin realized that they were waiting for him to get out and proceed on foot to Norton.

"Take it easy," he said to the Bradens, and watched the car swing right and pick up highway speed. The Bradens were about to enter into their own peculiar version of the kingdom of heaven. He himself needed another pump rod. The one Croley sold him turned out to be a painted white-metal casting instead of rolled steel. It had, of course, snapped the first time he used it.

Perce, Croley's literally half-witted assistant, waved guiltily at him as he approached the store. Perce bubbled over: "Gee, you should of seen 'im, mister, I bet he was a general or maybe a major. Boy, he came right into the store and he looked just like anybody else 'n'y he was a Red! Right into the store. Boy!"

Perce couldn't get over the wonder of it, and Justin, examining himself, was not sure that he could either. When would this thing seem real? Maybe it seemed real in the big cities, but his worn-eye view frustrated his curiosity and sense of drama. It was like sitting behind a post in a theatre, only the play was The Decline and Fall of the United States of America. A Russian—a general or maybe a major—appeared and then disappeared. The local underground Reds were summoned to service—where and what? The convoy passed you on the road, to duty where?

CROLEY was tacking up a notice, a big one that covered his bulletin board, buried the ration-book notices, the draft-call notices, the buy-bonds poster. It said:

SOVIET MILITARY GOVERNMENT
UNIT 449

Chingun County, New York State Residents are advised that on and after April 23, 1965, the following temporary measures will be observed:

1. A curfew is established from 9 p.m. to 5 a.m. All residents must be in their homes between these hours.
 2. Fashionable material must be turned in to this command at once since uranium, thorium and plutonium have been declared nationalized and unlawful for any private person to hold.
 3. All privately held pistols, rifles, shotguns and bayonets must be turned in to this command or representative. For the township of _____ this command's representative is _____.
- The weapons should be tagged with the owner's name and address and will later be returned.
4. Violators of these measures will be subject to military trial and if found guilty liable to sixty days in jail.

S. P. Platoff
Col., Commanding

Justin shook his head slowly. Sixty days! Was this the Red barbarian they had all been dreading? He seemed to hear Lew Braden saying again: "Smart cooky . . . exactly right."

Croley had gone behind his counter for something, a price-marking crayon. He was filling in the blanks in Number 5. "For the township of NORTON this command's representative is FLOYD C. CROLEY. The weapons should . . ."

Croley stepped back, looked for a moment at the black, neat printing, stuck the crayon behind his ear and turned to Justin, waiting and blank-faced.

Justin asked: "Since when have you represented the Red Army?"

Croley said: "He wanted a central place. Somebody steady." And that was supposed to dispose of that. Okay, you skunk, Justin thought. Wait until my two traitorous friends blow the whistle on you. When the Bradens finish telling the Reds all about Floyd C. Croley, Floyd C. Croley will be very small potatoes around these parts, or possibly Siberia. And aloud: "You sold me a dog, Mr. Croley. Look at this crummy thing."

He slapped down the two broken halves of the cheap, cast pump rod. Croley picked them up, turned them over in his hands and put them down again. "Never guaranteed it," he said. "For twelve-fifty it shouldn't break on the first stroke, Mr. Croley. I need a pump rod and I insist on a replacement."

Croley picked up the pieces again and examined them minutely. He said at last: "Allow you ten dollars on a fifteen-dollar rod. Steel. No coupons."

And that, Justin realized, was as good a deal as he'd ever get from the old snake. Too disgusted to talk, he slapped down a ten-dollar bill. Croley took it, produced another rod and a queer-looking five-dollar bill in change. The portrait was of a hot-eyed young man identified by the little ribbon as John Reed. Instead of "The United States of America," it said: "The North American People's Democratic Republic."

Justin's voice broke as he yelled:

"First thing," the Russian marshal said, "is to get rid of the Red troublemakers"

"What are you trying to put over, Croley? Give me a real bill, damn you!"

Croley shrugged patiently. A take-it-or-leave-it shrug. He condescended to explain: "He bought gas. It's good enough for him, it's good enough for me. Or you." And turned away to fiddle with the rack in which he kept the credit books of his customers.

Speechless, Justin rammaged the phony bill into his pocket, picked up the rod and walked away. As he opened the door the old man's voice came sharply: "Justin."

He turned. Croley said: "Watch your mouth, Justin." He jerked his thumb at the announcement ("... representative is FLOYD C. CROLEY. The weapons . . ."). He went back to his credit books as Justin stared incredulously, torn between laughter and disgust.

He walked out and across the Lehigh tracks. Nobody seemed to be in town; he was in for a four-mile walk, mostly uphill, to his place. The cows would be milked later—he quickened his pace.

AT THE highway a couple of Russian soldiers beside a parked jeep were just finishing erecting a roadside sign—blue letters on white, steel backing, steel post, fired-enamel front. They hadn't rushed that out in six days. That sign had been waiting in a Red Army warehouse for this day, waiting perhaps twenty years. It said: CHECK POINT 200 YARDS AHEAD. ALL CIVILIAN VEHICLES STOP FOR INSPECTION. That would be the old truck-weighing station, reactivated as a roadblock.

The Russians were a corporal and a private, both of the tall, blond, Baltic type. They had a slung Tommy gun apiece. He said: "Hi, boys."

The private grinned, the corporal scowled and said: "Nye panimayoo, Not per-mitten."

He wanted to say something witty and cutting, something about war-pusses, or the decadent plutocrat contaminating the pure proletariat, or how the corporal might make sergeant if his English were better. He looked at the Tommy guns instead, shrugged and walked on. Yes, he was scared. With the vivid imagination of an artist he could see the slugs tearing him. So the rage against Croley festered still, and the taste of defeat was still sour in his mouth. And he still had four uphill miles to walk to milk those loathsome cows of his.

By nine that night he was thinking of starting to work on Mr. Kommed's brandy. The current was on and, according to his electric clock, steady. He had lost the radio habit during the silent years. There was now apparently only one station on the air and it offered genes from Mademoiselle Madiste. He didn't want them. He leafed over a few of his art books and found them dull. Somewhere in the attic a six-by-eight printing press and a font of type were stashed, but he didn't feel like digging them out to play with. That had been one of the plans for his retirement. Old Mr. Justin would amuse himself by pottering with the press, turning out minuscule private editions of the shorter classics on Braden's beautiful hand-laid paper. Maybe old Mr. Justin would clear expenses, maybe not . . .

But now he was too sick at heart to think of the shorter classics and Braden was much too busy securing his appointment as Commissar of Norton Township or something to contribute the beautiful paper.

The phone rang two longs, his call. It was a girl's voice that he didn't recognize at first.

"It's Betsy," she said with whispered urgency. "No names. Your two friends—remember this morning?"

"Yes, yes, The Bradens. Well?" "Yes, I remember."

"In the basement of the school. The janitor saw the bodies before they took them away. They were shot. You knew them. I—I thought I ought to tell you. They must have been very brave. I never suspected . . ."

"Thanks," he said. "Good-by," and hung up.

Betsy thought the Bradens were some kind of heroic anti-Communists.

Then he began to laugh, hysterically. He could reconstruct it perfectly. The Marshal said to the General: "The first thing we've got to do is get rid of the damn Red troublemakers." And so it trickled down to "Pleas to expedite delivery of these, Mr. Postmaster," and so the Bradens got their summons and, unsuspecting, were taken down cellar and shot because, as Braden knew, the Reds were very smart cookies indeed. They knew, from long experience, that you don't want trained revolutionaries kicking around in a country you've just whipped, revolutionaries who know how to hide and subvert and betray, because all of a sudden you are stability and order, and trained revolutionaries are a menace. No, what you wanted instead of revolutionaries were people like Croley.

Croley!

He couldn't stop laughing. When he thought of thousands of underground American Communists lying tonight in their own blood on thousands of cellar floors, when he thought of Floyd C. Croley, Hero of Soviet Labor, Servant of the North American People's Democratic Republic, he couldn't stop laughing.

IV

APRIL 30 . . .

The first of the spring rains had come and gone. They were broadcasting weather forecasts again, which was good. You noticed that forecasts east of the Mississippi were credited to the Red Air Force Meteorological Service. From the Mississippi to the Pacific it was through the courtesy of the Weather Organization of the Chinese People's Republic. Apparently this meant that the two Communist powers had split the continent down the middle. China got more land, which it badly needed, and Russia got more machinery, which it badly needed. A very logical solution of an inevitable problem.

The Sunday Times had stopped coming, but Justin hardly missed it. He was a farmer, whether he liked it or not, and spring was his busy season. He had grudging time to attend the auction of the Bradens' estate, but once there he had picked up some badly needed tools and six piglets. Croley, under whose general authority the auction was held, himself bought the house and twelve acres for an absurd eight hundred dollars. Nobody bid against him, but after the place was knocked down to him half a dozen farmers tried to rent it. They were thinking of their sons and daughters in the service who should be luck very soon. Croley grudgingly allowed the Wehrweins to have the place at fifty dollars a month, cash or kind.

Justin was almost happy on the spring morning that was the fourteenth day of defeat. His future looked clear for the moment. The red clover was sprouting bravely in his west pasture; he'd be able to turn his cows out any day now and still have hay in reserve. Electric service was steady; he'd be able to run a single-strand electric fence instead of having to break his back repairing and tightening the wartime four-strand non-electric fences. The piglets looked promising; he anticipated an orgy of spareribs in the fall and all the ham, bacon and sausage he could eat through the winter. His two dozen hantams were gorging themselves on the bugs of spring and laying like mad; it meant all the eggs he wanted and plenty left over for the Eastern Milkshed Administration pickup. His vegetable garden was spaded and ready for seeding; his long years of weed chopping seemed to have suddenly paid off. There wasn't a sign of plain, burdock, or ironweed anywhere on his place.

At 10:30 the EMA truck ground to a stop at his roadside platform and over McGinty the driver was chery with spring. He loaded the cans and handed Justin his monthly envelope—and stood by, grinning, waiting for Justin to open it. Justin understood the gag when a few of the new phony bills fluttered from the statement. He counted up $93 in Bill Haywood ones, John Reed fives and Lincoln Steffens tens. He didn't give McGinty the satisfaction of seeing him blow his top. As a matter of fact, he wasn't particularly upset. If everybody agreed that this stuff was money, then it was money. He murmured: "Paying in cash now? I guess that means I sign a receipt."

McGinty, bitterly disappointed, produced a receipt book and a stub of pencil. "You should of heard old lady Wehrlein," he said reminiscently. Justin checked the statement (Apr. 1—Apr. 15 at Justin WH, Norton Twp. Chiungu Co., 31 cwt at $3, $93) and signed. McGinty's truck rumbled on.

It was a miserably small two-week net for eight good Holsteins, but they were near the end of their lactation period; soon he'd have to arrange for freshening them again.

HE WAS planting onion sets and radish seed in his vegetable garden when Rawson came down the road—the legless veteran whom he had met on the day of defeat. Rawson turned up at the estate sale and he found out that he had indeed got work at the Shiptons' farm, but for how long was anybody's guess with the Shiptons' three boys and two girls due for demobilization.

Rawson seemed to be in a hell of a hurry to get to him. Justin straightened up and met him at the road. "What's up?"

"Plenty, Billy. Couple of Red Army boys over at the Shiptons'. One's a farm expert, the other's an interpreter. They're going over the place with a fine-tooth comb. Bools down to that the Shiptons have to turn out twenty-five percent more milk, ten percent more grain, and God knows what else. The old lady told me to pass the word around. Fake your books, hide one of your cows—whatever you can think of. Push me off, will you? I've got some more ground to cover."

"Thanks," Justin said thoughtfully, and pushed. The little cart went spinning down the road, Rawson pumping away. He called it "my muscle-mob."

Justin mechanically went back to his onion and radish seed, but the sear had gone out of the spring morning. He couldn't think of one right, definite thing to do. He didn't come from twenty generations of farmers consummately skilled at looking poor when they were rich. He didn't know the thousand dodges farmers everywhere always used, almost instinctively, to cheat the tax man of his due for the Czar, the commissar, the Kumpser, the Shevref, the zamandar, La République, the American Way of Life. Billy Justin, like a fool, kept books—and only one set of them. He was a sitting duck.

THE JEEP with the red star arrived in mid-afternoon while he was mending fence in the pasture with a sledge, block and tackle, nippers and pliers. In spite of his heavy gloves he caught a few rips from the rusted, snarled old wire. He was feeling savage. He heard them honk for him, deliberately finished driving a cedar post and then slowly strolled toward the road.

Two privates were in the front seat, chauffeur and armed guard, two officers in the back, a captain and a lieutenant. Both young, both sweating in too-heavy wood dress uniforms with choker collars, both festooned with incomprehensible ribbons and decorations.

The lieutenant said, looking up from a typewritten list: "You're Mr. William H. Justin, aren't you?"

Justin gulped. To hear the flat, mid-west American speak coming from this fellow in this uniform was a jolt. It made the whole thing seem like a fancy-dress party. "Yes," he said. And then, inevitably: "You speak English very well."

"Thanks, Mr. Justin. I worked hard at it. I'm Lieut. Parelhoff of the 49th Military Government outfit, Translator. And this is Capt. Kirlov of the same command. He's the head of our agronomy group."

Kirlov, bored, jerked a nod at Justin.

"We'd like to look over your layout as part of a survey we're running. I see you're listed as primarily a dairy farmer, so let's start with your cow barn and milk house."

"Right this way," Justin said flatly. Captain Kirlov knew his stuff. He ascended at the unwatched milker, felt the bags of the eight Holsteins kicked disapprovingly at a rotten board. Through it all he directed a stream of Russian at Parelhoff who nodded and took notes. Once the captain got angry. He was burrowing through the corn crib and found rat droppings. He shook them under Justin's nose and yelled at him. After he disgustedly cast them aside and wiped his hands on a corn shuck the lieutenant said in an undertone: "He was explaining that rodents are intolerable on a well-run farm, that grain should be raised for the people and not for parasites."

"Uh-huh," Justin said. When the captain came across the six piglets he was delighted. Parelhoff said: "The captain is pleased that there are six. He says, 'At last I see the famous American principle of mass production. Our peasants at home wastefully indulge in roast-pig feasts instead of letting all the young grow to maturity.'"

Finally the captain mapped something definite and final, left the barn and headed for the jeep.

Parelhoff said: "Captain Kirlov establishes your norm at twenty hundredweight of milk per week. Do you understand what that means?"

"I know what twenty hundredweight of milk is. I don't know what a norm is."

"It is your quota. If you fall below twenty hundredweight per week consistently, or if your production falls to average out to that, you will be subject to review."

Parelhoff started to turn away. "Lieutenant, what does 'review' mean?"

"Your farming techniques will be studied. If you need a short course to improve your efficiency, you'll be given an opportunity to take it. We're organizing them up at Cornell. Or it may turn out that you're just temperamentally unsuited to farming. In that case we may have to look for a slot where you'll function more efficiently."

"Road gang?" Justin asked quietly. Parelhoff was embarrassed. "Please don't be truculent, Mr. Justin. Why should we put an intelligent person like you on a road gang? Now, please, come along to the jeep. Military Intelligence drafted us for another survey they're running. It'll only take a moment."

Justin managed to conceal his relief. He could manage twenty hundredweight a week very easily. Just a little

The jeep with the red star honked him from the pasture. "We'll look over your layout," the Russian officer said

"Do you swear to report any atomic-bomb parts?" the Russian said. Justin nodded more care to the herd's diet, got that rock-salt brick he'd been letting slide, promise the Shiptons a hog in the fall for some of their hoarded cottonseed cake. It would be a breeze, and Rowson had been unduly alarmed. But farmers had this habit of screaming bloody murder at the least little thing . . . he hated to admit it, but the red-star boys were being more than fair about it. He had drifted into sloppy farming.

At the jeep again Pareloff got out some papers and said: "Now, Mr. Justin, this is official. First, do you have any uranium, thorium or other fissionable material?"

Astounded, Justin said: "Of course not!"

"A simple 'No' is sufficient. Sign here, please." He held out one of the papers, his finger indicating the space. Justin read; it was simply a repeat of the statement that he did not have any fissionable materials in his possession. He signed with the lieutenant's pen.

"Thank you. Do you know of any fissionable material that is held by any private parties? Sign here. 'Thank you. Would you recognize fissionable material if you saw it?'"

"I don't think so, lieutenant."

"Very well, then. Please pay attention. Refined uranium, thorium and plutonium look like lead, but are heavier. A spherical piece of uranium weighing fifty pounds, for instance, would be no larger than a softball. Please sign here—it is a simple statement that I have described the appearance of fissionable materials to you. 'Thank you. Now would you recognize the components of an atomic bomb if you saw them?'"

"No!"

"Very well, then. Please pay attention. An atomic bomb is simply a fifty-pound mass of plutonium or uranium-235. Before exploding it consists of two or more pieces. These pieces are slammed together fast and the bomb then explodes. The slamming can be done by placing two pieces at opposite ends of a gun barrel and then blowing them together so they meet in the middle. Or it can be done by placing several chunks of plutonium on the inside of a sphere and then exploding what are called 'shaped charges' so the chunks are driven together into one mass and the atomic bomb proper explodes. Do you understand? Then sign here."

"Now, our Military Intelligence people would like you to swear or affirm that you will immediately report any evidence of fissionable material or atomic-bomb parts in private hands which you may encounter. Do you so swear?"

"I do," Justin said automatically. Pareloff had for a moment grinned wryly—and there had been a cryptic inflection on "Military Intelligence." Hell, no doubt about it—all armies were pretty much alike. Here these two serious people were going about the serious business of stabilizing the country's food supply and some brass hat got a bright idea: saddle them with another job, even if it's a crackpot search for A-bombs in Chianga County.

He signed. Pareloff handed over a poster, a hastily printed job with hastily drawn line cuts. "Please put this up somewhere in your house, Mr. Justin, and that will be that. Good afternoon."

He spoke to the captain in Russian, the captain spoke to the chauffeur and away they drove.

Justin studied the poster; it conveyed the same information Pareloff had given him. Atomic bombs! He snorted and went back to his fence mending.

YES, IT seemed the Reds were determined to be firm but fair. Betsy told him there had been a near rape in Chianga Center one night last week. By the next morning the attacker had been tazed, found guilty and shot against the handball court at the junior high school—a beetle-browed corporal from some Eastern province of the USSR. It hadn't healed the girl, but at least it showed that the Reds were being pretty touchy about their honor.

He chuckled suddenly. Without recording the fact, he had noticed that all four of the soldiers in the jeep had wrist watches, good, big chronometer jobs, identical government issue. So the Russians were still sure about their reputation as snatchers of watches, and had taken the one measure that would keep their troops from living up to it: giving them all the watches they could use.

Betsy said she and most of the people in the Center were pleasantly surprised. She in fact wished that her father hadn't run away. Nobody had even been around asking about him, national committeeman though he was, yet he was hiding out now in some Canadian muskeg living on canned soup and possibly mousie meat—though Betsy doubted that old T. C. was capable of bringing down a moose. She hoped he would drift back when the word got to him that the red-star boys' ferocity had been greatly exaggerated.

She saw Colonel Platoff every now and then from a distance; he was the big brass of SMGU 449. He looked like a middle-aged career soldier, no more and no less. He seemed to be a big on spit-and-polish. People observed him hawling out sentries over buttons and shoelaces and suchlike. There were always plenty of KPs in the mess tent on the high-school campus.

What else was new? Well, there was a twenty-four-hour guard on each of the town's two liquor shops to keep soldiers from looting or trying to purchase. There seemed to be movies every evening in the school auditorium. There was a ferocious physical-fitness program going on; SMGU 449 started the day with fifty knee bends, fifty straddle hops and fifty push-ups, from Platoff on down, rain or shine, in the athletic field. They also played soccer when off duty and they sang interminably. Whenever they were more than two Russians gathered with nothing to do out came a concertina or a uk-e-sized balalaika and they were off.

A big fat cook stopped in town for the officers' mess, which must be located in the school cafeteria. The enlisted men lived on tea, breakfast slop called kasha, black bread, jam and various powerful soups involving beef, cabbage, potatoes and beets. The ingredients came in red-star trucks from the north.

Rumors? Well, she had a few and she was passing them on just for entertainment. The Russians would shortly be joined by the Czechs, and they would close all the churches in Chianga Center. They would not close any of the churches, but instead would forcibly baptize everybody as Greek Orthodox. Demobilization of the United States Army would be completed by next week. Demobilization of the United States Army would be begun next month. The United States Army was being shipped in cattle boats to Siberia. The United States Army had disintegrated and the boys and girls were finding their way home on foot. The United States Army Atomic Service had made off with two tons of plutonium from Yellowstone before the surrender . . .

As that one ran through his mind Justin suddenly straightened up from the tangled wire.

Two tons of plutonium was enough for eighty atomic bombs. It seems that in any machine shop you could put the bombs together if you had the plutonium.

Two tons of plutonium adrift somewhere in the United States, scattered but in the hands of men who knew what they were doing, might explain quite a few things that had recently puzzled him.

And the thought gave him a stab of painful hope. It let him feel at last the full anguish of the defeat, the reality of it. He burned with shame suddenly for his lick-spittle acceptance of a firm-but-fair Lieutenant Parolhoff and his gratitude, his disgusting gratitude, that they had raised his norm no higher, his pleasure at Captain Kirlov's bored compliment about the pigs.

Suddenly the defeat was real and agonizing. Two tons of plutonium had made it so.

V

GOOD drying weather, the radio had been saying for days. Justin, breaking clods and weeding in his cornfield, reflected that once you would have called it the beginning of a serious drought. The passage of two months, however, had made pessimism unfashionable—almost dangerous. Not that he was afraid. Nobody had anything on Billy Justin; he met his quota and he had been left alone . . .

Until now. A jeep was tooting impatiently for him in front of his house. More foolishness, he supposed, with Kirlov and his interpreter. At least it would be a break in the swing.

There was only one Russian there, however, some kind of sergeant. He said: "Former Voostin?"

"I guess so," Justin said, and waited, not knowing what to expect.

The sergeant handed him a sheet of ugly two-column printing on flimsy paper, Russian on the left, English on the right: Readjustment of Agricultural Norms — W. Justin, Good! Norm, how much were they going to cut from . . . He hauled up short at the words filled in. "Increase 1 cwt. per 2 wks."

He said angrily to the sergeant: "In this weather? Kirlov's a mistake. I can't do done. I'm hauling water for the cows now. And we haven't got DDT. Flies cut down the production. I haven't got a seed-cake quota; my herd's too small. There must be some mistake. Can you take back word to the captain?"

The sergeant, bored, said: "Ya nye ponimayete es." He held out a clipboard, a ruled form and a pen. "Podpisat' podschetyemskiy." Justin said uncertainly: "Speak English? Tell Captain Kirlov?"

Headshake, then, very slowly and patiently: "Nye-ponimayete. Nye." Brandishing the form and pen: "Podschetyemskiy. Eremskiy. Zdyak." He pointed to a line; Justin could do nothing but write his name, numbly.

The sergeant roared off in a cloud of dust. Justin stood there and spat grit from his mouth. This time no genial interpreter; this time no firm-but-fair agronomist. This time—orders. Quite unarguable orders.

He noticed the date on the quota form. July 4.

"Where the devil is everybody?"

RAWSON came visiting in his go-cart and Justin sourly told him his discovery. The legless man shrugged his giant shoulders. "Shiptons got one too," he said. "That's why they sent me over. Didn't want to use the phone. They're thinking about holding kind of a petition."

Justin said violently: "The old fools!" And then, slower: "But they are old. I guess they just don't get it. Didn't you try to talk them out of it?" "Me? The hired man? To Sam Shipton that's farmed his farm for sixty years and his father and his gram' pappy before him? I saved my breath. Rather take a little spin in the muscle-mobile than pitch manure any day. I guess I tell them 'no' from you."

"Of course. But isn't there some way you can try and keep them out of trouble? Explain, for instance, that it isn't like petitioning the highway commissioner to grade a road or put in a new culvert. Extra different?"

"Sam Shipton's an independent farmer, Billy. He's going to stay one if it kills him."

"I may do that, Sarge. Sooner than he thinks."

"Been wondering why you call me 'Sarge.' Matter of fact, I was a buck-tail private in the rear rank. Another thing—confidentially. On my own, not the Shiptons. I happen to have a little bit of contraband . . ."

The word covered a lot of ground. Narcotics. Untaxed liquor. Home-grown tobacco. Guns, ammunition—even reloading tools. Any item of Red Army equipment, from a pint of their purple-dyed gasoline to a case of their combat rations. Unlicensed scientific equipment and material. It was all posted on the board down at Cruley's store in Norton. Not once had Justin heard of anybody being arrested or even chided for violating the rules, though old Mr. Konrad continued to distill and peddle his popskull, and those who snuck up here grew their own tobacco, minimally concealed, with varying success. Guns and ammunition practically all of it—had been turned in and stood racked and tagged in Cruley's storeroom, under Red Army seal. There was a widespread impression that about guns and ammunition the orders were not kidding, that the rest was just the product of some brain last covering himself for the record. They were farmers up here, but farmers who had been under fire at San Juan Hill, Belleau Wood, Anzio, Huertgen, Iwo, Pyongyang, Juncos, Yellowstone . . . not one of them but was army wise.

Why speak of contraband?

"What about it?" Justin asked warily.

Rawson shrugged. "I want to pass it on to a fella I know, but I don't especially want him to come to the Shiptons. It isn't bulky. I'd just like to drop it off here some time and he'll come by in a day or less and pick it up."

"Why me?" Justin asked flatly. "Do I look especially like a smuggler?"

"Not especially," Rawson grinned. "Mostly because you live alone. Also because you wouldn't chisel on me. You're a guy who can't be bothered with doing things the crooked way. Old man Konreid lives alone, but he'd rip open the package as soon as I was out of sight, taste it, and then when my friend came he'd pretend he didn't know what he was talking about."

So it was liquor or drugs or something of the sort. Justin felt pleased that he had got the answer without crude questioning. Not that Rawson would have had anything to do with anything organized which might conceivably bring retribution. The man was a born scrounger, a cutter of not very important corners. He told him: "Drop it off when you want. Any time I can't do a favor for a neighbor I'll close up shop."

"Thanks, Billy," the legless man said. "Push me off, will you?"

AT MAIL TIME Justin got to wondering if the Fourth of July was a national holiday in the North American People's Democratic Republic of which he was a citizen. The morning was hot anyway, he strolled up to the mailbox. It was an easier trip than it used to be. As a citizen of the North American People's Democratic Republic he had lost a comfortable layer of fat at the waist.

Betsy Cardew was waiting at the mailbox looking tired.

He said: "Cultural greetings, comrade-citizeness-postwoman."

"Cultural greetings to you, comrade-citizen-milk-farmer. What the heck kept you?"

"July fourth. I dithered around a couple of minutes wondering if you'd be here."

"Oh, the mail must go through," she said vaguely.

"Then where's mine?"

"As a matter of fact you haven't got anything today. I wanted to talk to you."

"I'm listening."

"You got one of those quota increases?"

"Yes. Fifty pounds more per week. I don't know how I'm going to make it. They can't really expect it from me, can they?"

"They expect it. It went through two weeks ago in Pennsylvania. They've been picking up families who didn't make the norm. Families with the biggest and best farms. They go south in trucks, men, women and kids. Nobody seems to know where. Then they turn the acreage over to families from marginal farms that couldn't possibly raise a cash crop. Billy, could you make your new norm with a farmland?"

"You know I can't support a --"

"This farmland would have his board paid by the SMGU."

"That's different. And what's the catch?"

"He'd be a little nuts. Wait a minute, Billy! Don't let panic make up your mind until I tell you about him."

"You know I'm a nurse's aide three nights a week at Chuanga General. I was in surgery a week ago when they brought this guy in. His name's Griddle. He was in shock and he'd lost plenty of blood. His hands were lacerated and there was a gash along his right forearm that cut the big superficial veins. But somebody, a cop I think, slapped a tourniquet on him and got him to the hospital. We sewed him up and gave him plasma and whole blood—he got a pint of mine—and snugly waited for him to wake up. He did, and he was nuts. Incoherent, disoriented. At that point I tottered off to home and bed.

"Patient motch batter," said the Soviet doctor. So Gribble became a farm hand

"When I came in on Wednesday afternoon they had him transferred from surgery to psycho. Lieutenant Borovsky's in charge of psycho, but I don't think you have to know very much to handle a psycho ward Russian style. They have something they call 'sleep therapy.' This means you give the patient a twenty-four-hour shot of barbiturate. If he's still nuts when he wakes up you give him another one, and so on. Maybe there are angles to it that I don't understand, but Borovsky's English isn't any better than my Russian.

"I'd asked around during the day and found out what happened to Gribble. He was a stranger in town and he turned up at Clapp's department store. He bought a pair of socks and a salesgirl noticed him standing around for maybe ten minutes inside, banging back from the revolving door. The side doors were locked, and nuts to the fire laws. Clapp's doesn't aim to air-condition the whole town. Well, she's seen eighty-year-old farmmen do exactly the same thing, but she thought it was awfully funny for a middle-aged man. Finally Gribble made the plunge into the revolving door, and naturally it stuck halfway. The wooden lip from somebody's umbrella jammed it. Gribble began screaming and pounding, and in no time at all he had the glass smashed and his arm cut up. So they toted him away and the salesgirl said Mr. Clapp was livid because his plate-glass insurance is all whacked up by this new insurance-company consolidation that nobody seems to be able to collect from and also he had to open the side doors and turn off his precious air conditioning.

"So much for that. I looked at Gribble's papers in the hospital office. He's a machine-shop setup man from Scranton. He was released as surplus last week by the Erie. He got a travel permit good to Corning to look for a job there. His hobbies are baseball, bowling and fishing. He belongs to the American Federation of Machinists, the Red Cross and the Veterans of Foreign Wars. Normal?"

"Normal," Justin said.

"Phony. Because I went to see him in psycho. He was just coming out of his first twenty-four-hour sleep, mumbling and stirring. Then the mumbler got clearer. Gribble the normal machinist was reciting Molière in the original. As far as I could judge, his accent was very good. It was Act II of Le Misanthrope. He seemed to be enjoying himself."

"Come on," Justin said. "It happens every day. He heard the Molière once, maybe when he was a child, and it stayed in his subconscious. Under drugs—"

"Naturally," Betsy said, very cool and composed. "And let me, doctor: when and where in his childhood did he hear the order of battle of the Red Armies as of April 17, 1965?"

"No," Justin said defensively.

"Yes. I don't remember it all, but after the Molière his face changed and he began to mutter the date. Then he began to rattle off the armies, the corps, the divisions. With commanders' names and locations around Edmonton, Map-grid locations. He was just swinging into 'Appreciation and Development of Comba' (statute). For Eyes of Combined Chiefs of Staff Only' when Borovsky came strutting down the ward.

"He beamed down at Gribble, the normal machinist, but by then was massing a Canadian Army Group, the 17th, I think, for a spoiling attack on the left flank of the Red bulge. 'Patient motch batter,' Borovsky said, and on he went. His English is ninety-nine percent bluff, thank the Lord. But the night duty officer was Major Lange and I had to shut Gribble up before his inspection. He really talks it. I finally slapped Gribble awake and he began to cry.

"'Pull yourself together,' I told him. 'You've been talking about the wrong things in your sleep. They'll give you another shot if they don't think you're better. You're in the Chiung General Hospital. Tell 'em you're just nervous and tired. They want to get mine cases out of here if they can. Play along with them. Fit into the routine and you'll be out of here fast.'

"He understood me, the scared little guy. I don't know what kind of personal hell he was going through, but I could see him pushing it away, hard, with every muscle. 'Fit into the routine,' he said at last. 'This is the Chiung General Hospital. I'm Gribble. I just got panicky stuck in the—that place. I'm better now. Just tired and nervous.' Hysteria, I'm trying to break in between the words. And he wouldn't let it.

"'Great,' I told him. 'Stay on the rails. Here they come.' Borovsky was leading a unit through the ward. What they stopped at Gribble's bed Lange asked me what the devil I was doing there. Told him I might be able to expedite the discharge of Mr. Gribble."

"Discharge? Who are you talking about? This man is seriously ill."

"Gribble spoke up then, bless him. 'I don't think I am, sir,' he said apologetically. 'I know I blanked out, but I feel all right now. Just a little nervous and tired.' They didn't notice that he had his eyes on me through it—I think that helped him.

"'Patient motch batter,' that pompous ass Borovsky said.

"Lange put him through the questioning. Gribble knew who he was and where he was and why he was there. Then there was a good deal of Russat between Lange and Borovsky and then the major said to me: 'It seems you were correct. He should not be in one of our beds. Have the clerical section arrange for outpatient status and board with some responsible family.'

"That wasn't quite what I'd hoped for, but then I thought of you." She came to a dead stop.

"How long would Billy Justin say slowly: 'How long would he be on my neck?'"

"Until he's discharged. Comparable cases have been discharged after two checkup visits—call it a month."

"Who do you suppose he is, Betsy?"

"I don't know. I can't imagine. He wasn't any government official up top. I know most of the faces. He couldn't possibly be a field commander. Our Mr. Gribble would never rise to corporal in the field army. He's some kind of planner, maybe a Pentagon colonel though that doesn't seem right either. Whoever he is, he's had a shock that almost broke him. He's a brave little man. And they'll shoot him if they find out that he isn't who he claims to be."

"He isn't the only one they'll shoot," Justin said. She made some kind of reply and he shouted at her: "All right, I'll be the responsible family. I'll be his mother and his father and his damned old Aunt Tizzie." She raised one hand feebly as he spewed his rage at her. "Send him along. Dump him here. You knew I couldn't turn you down. Even if I thought I closed the books in Korea. Even if I've been shot. You never lay in a field hospital with an infected wound eating your leg off, you never screamed when you saw them coming with the needle for your fifteenth penicillin shot in two days. You think it's a game. So send your brave little man along, I'll take care of him. But after what you've done, don't ever speak to me again."

He turned from her stunned white face and limped down the hill.

VI

TWO RUSSIAN medics delivered Gribble the next afternoon. They looked about in a puzzled way and kept asking: "Sooprogah? Seen? Donkh?" Justin supposed they were wondering about the rest of the responsible family. "I don't understand," he told them, dead pan. Finally there was the receipt to sign and they drove away, still with the puzzled air.

"You're Gribble," Justin said to the little man. He was trembling under the hot sun. He nodded and gave a frightened glance at the house.

Justin, through an almost sleepless night, had decided on his approach. If the man wanted to be Gribble the machinist, then Gribble the machinist he would be. Justin wanted no confidences. Justin wanted Gribble to be a nervous - breakdown outpatient and nothing more. He was sending the two medics to report that Farmer Yostin had no family and that Patient Gribble should therefore be placed somewhere else, but he doubted that they would go so far.

"Ever done any farming?"

"No."

"Ever have a little vegetable garden?"

"Yes. Oh, yes. I've done that."

"Good. Well, I'll show you your room." He started for the house, Gribble lagging behind. When Justin entered the kitchen he was climbing the two steps to the porch. And there he stood, before the screen door, with the look on his face of a man who has seen a cobra.

"Come on in," Justin said through the door.

"I'd rather not unless I have to, Mr. Justin," came from that mask of terror.

Justin remembered that his blowup had occurred when he was trapped in a revolving door. And he was also wearily conscious of the endless petty inconveniences that would nag him if Gribble balked at every doorway.

"Nothing's going to happen to you, Gribble," he said with an edge on his voice. "It's a perfectly ordinary fly-blown slummy back-ber's kitchen." The man smiled meagerly. Justin held the door open and waited; Gribble stepped convulsively over the threshold closing his eyes for a moment. Justin closed the door quietly on Gribble's rigid back; instinctively told him that to let it slam in its normal violent fashion would immediately involve him in a pack of trouble.

"Sit down and have some coffee," he told the little man. Coffee was not casually drunk these days. If you had it you saved it for a good jolt in the morning. But he had to make this man relax; otherwise life would be an unbearable round of walking on eggs.

Gribble sat and said "Thank you" into his steaming cup.

"It isn't such a bad life here," Justin said tentatively. "I think you'll rest a little better than you would in town. You can hold back eggs and hide your chickens when they come around. And the work won't be too hard with the two of us. Hell, wherever you are you have to work—it might as well be here."

"That's right," said Gribble eagerly.

The conversation then petered out. They finished their coffee and Justin led the way to the porch. "The barn needs cleaning out," he said. "I'll show you where the—" He stopped. Gribble stood inside the kitchen and he outside, the screen door between them.

Justin sighed and held the door open for the little man. With an apologetic smile Gribble lunged through the doorway, eyes shut for a moment.

So it went through the afternoon. Gribble walked willingly into the barn and worked hard, but when Justin sent him to the toolshed built on the house for a trenching spade he was gone ten minutes. Justin went after him, swearing. It was, of course, the toolshed door. Gribble was reaching for the handle, but he couldn't quite bring himself to touch it.

Justin opened the door grimly, yanked out the spade, handed it to Gribble and closed the door. His resolution to let Gribble be Gribble cracked wide open. "What is all this?" he demanded.

The little man said faintly: "I had a very disagreeable experience once. Very disagreeable." He leaned against the toolshed wall, his face white. "I'd rather not discuss it."

Justin, alarmed, said: "All right. We won't. Let's get back to the barn—"

if you think you can make it?" Gribble could make it. He worked through to dinner time hard and well. Justin cooked a wretched bachelor's meal big enough for two and held the dishes for Gribble to come in and eat. He didn't eat much; something was on his mind. He finally asked if he could have a cot on the porch instead of a bedroom. "Sure," said Justin. "I'll get a cot for the arctic. And to himself: I might have expected it."

AFTER dinner they had three hours of light and used it to haul water from the spring up the road to the tank in the cow barn. When he did the job himself he could use nothing but a pair of galvanized pails. Gribble's help meant that between them they could fill a hundred-pound milk can on each trip. Justin began to feel a little more optimistic about meeting the brutal new milk norms. Each of his cows would, for the first time since the pasture spring went dry in June, get all the water she wanted that night. In his cheerfulness he scarcely noticed Gribble except as the hand on the other handle of the hundred-pound can. But when they topped off the tank with their twenty-fourth load an exhausted voice asked him: "Is there more to do?" Gribble was on the verge of collapse. "My God," Justin said. "I'm sorry. You're out of the hospital—I didn't think. Cows come first," he added bitterly. "Sure, we can knock off. I'll get that cot."

The little man slumped on the porch steps while he set it up in the gathering darkness and then without a word fell onto the dusty canvas. He was asleep in seconds. Justin thought, went for a cotton blanket and spread it over Gribble to keep the flies off his face and hands and went to the road for a final smoke before turning in. There was a sawed-off tree stump he usually sat on when he could watch the sunset.

Rawson was waiting there. "Hi, Billy," the legless man said easily.

"Hello," Justin had his pouch out. Grudgingly he held it to Rawson. "Smoke?"

"Thanks." Rawson whisked a single cigarette paper from his breast pocket, dipped thumb and finger in the pouch. In a twirl and a lick he had a cigarette made. A tramp, Justin thought. A drifting bum with all the skills of a drifting bum. How easily he takes it! It has to be him that he's a drifter under the heels or the United States! A perennial outlaw—and God, how I envy his power of mind! Heavily he stuffed his pipe with dry tobacco. Rawson had lit his cigarette and politely passed him the burning match. He puffed the pipe slight. It tasted vile, but it was tobacco.

Rawson was inhaling luxuriously. "Not bad," he commented. "Your own stuff?"

"About half. The rest is from Croley. There was a tax stamp on it, but I think it's local stuff too. He probably refilled a pack with some junk he bought from a farmer."

"My, such goings-on from the virtuous storekeeper. Well, I brought that package. A man'll be by tonight or tomorrow."

"Well, let's see it."

Rawson reached deep into the boat of his gocar, a space where his legs would have fitted if he had any. The package was small and dim in the fading light.

The set of his muscles, the leverage of his arm should have warned Justin to brace himself when the package was handed over; but he was disarmed by the smallness of the thing. He took the package, found it amazingly heavy, fumbled it for a moment and dropped it, almost on his toe. It sank an inch into the not-particularly-soft ground.

"Oops!" Rawson said apologetically. "I should have warned you it was heavy."

"Yes," Justin said. "And maybe you should have warned me it was an atomic bomb."

"Just part of one," Rawson said.

"You know Betsy Cardew?" Justin asked, looking at the package by his toe, wondering vaguely about radioactivity, wondering whether he ought to move his toe.

"Of course. Mailwoman."

"Are you and she in this together?"

"In what?" Rawson asked blandly.

"We are not amused, Rawson. This thing—" He choked. "I got beautifully mad at her. I'm still sore. I think she's a silly kid who had no right to get me involved. You—you know the score. So—why me, Rawson? Why me?"

"The legless man said brutally: "If you think I'm going to flatter you, you're going to be disappointed. It's you, Justin, because we're scraping the bottom of the barrel. Our best and bravest are in Siberian labor camps now, or mining uranium in the Antarctic. Why you, indeed! Have I got any business scoting around after dark with a suitcase bomb in my lap?"

"Hot what's it all for?" Justin almost begged. "What can we do? Suitcase bombs, yes, but then what?"

"That," Rawson said, "is none of your business, as a moment of thought will convince you. Will you handle the transfer or won't you?"

"I will," Justin said bitterly. "Thanks for your confidence in me. I hope it's well placed."

"So do I, Justin. So do I. Will you push me off?"

He went creaking down the road. Justin relit his pipe and studied the dying sunset. Then he picked up the heavy linen package, walked to the barn and hid it behind a bale of hay. It was not very well hidden. He wanted to be able to get it fast and get it off his hands fast. Furthermore, he knew very well that no amount of energy spent in hiding smothered animals or plutonium would safeguard it against search with a scintillation counter.

He stepped quietly past Gribble, sleeping on the porch and went upstairs to his bedroom. He did not intend to sleep that night—not while waiting for an unknown person to pick up an atomic bomb subassembly for use in some insane foredoomed scheme of sabotage.

He tried to read, but could not. He smoked the last of his tobacco in two unwanted pipefuls.

Insane, the whole business! There were supposed to be five million occupation troops east of the Mississippi alone. Their own third-rate shopping place, Chuings Center, was garrisoned by the 449th Soviet Military Government Unit which, when administrative transport and medical frills were ripped off, turned out to be a reinforced infantry regiment; about a thousand fighting men armed to the teeth.

And what could you do?

Well, you could denounce Hawson and turn his bomb over to the 449th SMGU. You could denounce Hetty Cardew—nitwitted rich girl who used sex and your vestigial pride to unload a deadly menace on you. You could get written up as a patriotic citizen of the North American People's Democratic Republic, get a life pension as a Hero of Socialist Labor. And then there would be nothing for you to do but cut your throat in self-lanthing.

In spite of himself he fell asleep at 3 a.m. with the 40-watt bulb shining on his face and the unread book open across his chest.

VII

HE WOKE with a panicky start at eight-thirty. What was wrong? Something was terribly wrong.

At the window he saw the cows turned out to pasture. But they should have been bellowing, un milked, for an hour or more . . .

But the milk cans were stacked on the loading platform for the pickup truck. Gribble had milked them! With only a few words from yesterday afternoon to go on he had worked the milking machine and turned the cows out.

And that meant he had been in the barn where . . .

Justin dashed downstairs, his heart thudding, and then slowed deliberately to a walk. He found the little man in the yard before the barn scouring the milker and pails. "Good morning," he said.

"Good morning, Mr. Justin. I don't know if I did the right thing, but the cows were stamping around and I remembered what you told me—it wasn't hard."

"You did exactly the right thing. I couldn't get to sleep last night. And when I did I guess I couldn't wake up. I'm sorry I left it all to you. Have you been in the—kitchen?"

Gribble smiled nervously and shook his head.

"I'll fix breakfast."

Justin kept himself, by an effort of will, from walking into the barn, in plain sight of Gribble, and looking to see whether that bale of hay had been disturbed. He turned to the house, started the stove and cooked oatmeal. Half a pint of withheld butterfat made oatmeal breakfast enough for a morning's hard work. When it was cooked he called Gribble, who stopped on the porch apologetically until the door was held open for him.

They ate silently.

"Mind washing up?" Justin asked at last. "I'll be working in the kitchen garden." As he left he latched back the screen door, feeling like a fool.

He was heading not for the garden but for the barn when the clong of a worn-out truck rumbled along his road. It was Milkshed arriving ahead of time, he absently supposed, and went over to the loading deck to give a hand with the cans. But it wasn't the milkshed truck that rounded the turn. It was a worn blue panel job throbbing and growning out of all proportion to its size. On the rear panel was lettered: Bee-Jay Farm Supplies and Machinery, Washington, Penna.

It stopped by the milk cans and a nondescript driver leaned out. "This the Justin place?"

"Yes, I'm Justin. You have anything for sale, mister?"

"Might let you have some plastic pipe."

"Got an electric pump to go with it? My spring's downhill from the barn."

"Yes, I guess I passed it. Sorry about the pump, but we don't have them yet. Maybe by next spring, the way things are going."

"That's good to hear. You know, you're the first salesman I've seen here in three years?"

"That's what they all say. Bee-Jay's an enterprising outfit. We got the first A-440 passes in the state. Say, are you by any chance a friend of Rawson's?"

Justin knew then who he was. "I know him," he said. "I guess I shouldn't take the pipe if I can't use it right away. Seen Rawson lately?"

"I heard he was somewhere around here. He didn't happen to leave anything for me, did he?"

"Just a minute." He went to the barn aware that this was the moment of decision. There was no reason why Rawson and Betsy couldn't be framing him. There was no reason why Gribble couldn't be a planted witness for corroboration. The heavy package was behind the bale of hay where he had put it in darkness. He couldn't possibly know whether Gribble had found it and replaced it or not. And now, picking it up, carrying it, handing it silently to the man in the truck, he had completed his treason to the North American People's Democratic Republic. He had received, harbored and transmitted fissionable material. His head was in the noose from that moment on.

He felt all the better for it.

"Good old Rawson," the Bee-day man chuckled, hefting the package. "Well, Mr. Justin, I'll try to pass by again—with a pump."

"Do that," Justin said steadily. "And if you ever feel any need to call on me, do it. I'm available."

The man smiled blandly. The starting motor cranked and strained for fifteen seconds before the engine caught and the little truck lurched off down the road. Justin followed it with his eyes until it was over the next crest and out of sight.

HE TURNED to find Gribble staring at him from the corner of the barn. Justin wasn't frightened; the time for that was past. He realized that he would feel physical fear before long while he waited in some schoolhouse cellar for the NKVD to come clumping in with truncheons and methodically reduce him to a blob of pain, shrieking confessions on demand. But he did not fear.

He told Gribble easily: "The first salesman in three years. He had some pipe but he didn't have a pump. Maybe by spring, he said. I guess things are picking up all around."

"Yes," Gribble said vaguely, his eyes full of tears.

They worked steadily through the morning and afternoon. Gribble spent two hours on the milk cooler, which had been grunting, gurgling and creaking for a month, on the verge of a breakdown. Whatever else he was besides—a quoter of Molière, Pentagon colonel—he was unquestionably an able refrigeration mechanic and bench hand. He serviced the motor and coils, disassembled the pump, cut new gaskets from a discarded inner tube, filed a new cam from scrap metal and installed it. The cooler whispered happily and the red line of the thermometer dropped well below the danger mark for the first time that summer. He showed Justin his work, dully proud, and then joined him in cultivating the knee-high field corn until it was time to haul water from the spring again. They had a late supper at three-thirty; a dubious piece of boiled salt pork, potatoes from the barrel in the cellar, milk. It was then that Gribble asked whether Justin happened to have anything to drink.

"Some local brandy," Justin said, wondering. The little man was tightening up again. If you were an artist you saw him as taut cords vibrating in the shape of a human body. He had seemed almost happy and slack when he showed Justin the cooler . . .

"Could I please . . . ?"

Justin got the carelessly hidden bottle of Mr. Konreid's popskull. Gribble methodically poured himself half a tumblerful, not bothering to rinse his glass of its skim of rich milk. Methodically he drank it down, his Adam's apple working. "Rotten stuff," he said after a long pause. Justin was about to be offended when he somehow realized that Gribble didn't mean his liquor in particular. "I was partly tanked when I had that trouble in the—department store." The taut strings were relaxing a little. "But sometimes you haven't got anything else and you have to get to sleep."

Uninvited, he refilled his tumbler to the halfway mark. Justin protested: "Man, what's the good of getting drunk in the afternoon? We have another making and the corner fence post is sagging. Both of us will have to fix it. Pour that back in the bottle, will you? You can have it after supper if you can't sleep . . ."

Gribble methodically drank it down. "No point in fooling around," the little man said gravely. "You pretend you're somebody else, fine. But you know you aren't, especially when you're trying to sleep. You're still the fellow who closed the door. But that was only half the job, Justin. Fancy part is, if you do the first half—that is, if you're a fellow like me—then you can't do the second half. They never thought of that. I must have looked pretty good on the profile. Hard-bitten, waspish executive and all that. But I didn't fool the combat boys. I went right out of Prudential—you should have seen my office, Justin!—and right into the Pentagon. I told them—what do you say?—I told them: 'Alert, capable executive desires connection with first-class fighting force. Feels his abilities are not being used to the utmost capacity in present employment.' I went through the lieutenants and captains like a hot knife through butter. I've handled kids like that all my life. G-1 checked me

"You don't need brains to say 'Attack!'" barked Clardy. So the neurotic Gribble never got to fight the Russians through. You know why? Because G-1's just office management in uniform. We talked the same language. I was exactly like no one they thought I was good. So I got my appointment with Clardy. Three stars. Colonel Hagen—imagine having a chicken colored for a secretary—Hagen briefed him first, told him I was talent, hard-boiled talent, kind of talent they needed fast for a battalion, then a regiment, then maybe a division. You go up fast in wartime if you've got the stuff. So Clardy talked to me for a few minutes and then he turned to Hagen. As if I wasn't there. Cussed Hagen out for wasting his time. "Good Lord, colored, get him something in G-1 or G-4, but don't ever give him a combat command. Look at him! Can you imagine him committing troops?"

"You see, Justin? He was onto me in two minutes. They never say it, even among themselves, but they know combat command doesn't take brains. They talk about brilliant field generals, but when you try to find out what the brilliance was it's always this G-1 gets the brilliant general his men; G-2 gets the brilliant general his information; G-3 trains the men and plans the attack; G-4 gets the supplies. Then the brilliant general says 'Attack!' and it's another victory."

"You know, you don't need brains to say 'Attack!' Plenty of them have brains and they don't seem to do them any damage, but brains aren't essential. What you need's character. When you've got character you say 'Attack' at the right time. And Clardy saw in two minutes that I didn't have it. That I'd wait and hang back and try to think of ways around when there aren't any ways around at all. That when G-3 told me it was time to attack I wouldn't take his word for it, I'd hem and haw and wonder if he really believed what he was telling me. Clardy saw clear through me. Justin, I'm a man who can cheerfully commit a battery of IHM card punches to the fray and that's all."

The little man lurched to his feet and stared, red-eyed, at Justin. Waiting.

Slowly and unwillingly Justin said: "What do you want, Gribble? What am I supposed to do about all this?"

Staring, Gribble said: "Very easy, Justin. But you've got to help me. I know you're committed. I milked the cows this morning. I'm a picture straightener; I always have been. So I started to straighten that bale of hay, Package behind it—heavy package. So heavy it's got to be gold or lead or plutonium. And I know it isn't gold or lead."

"The farm salesman came by. I looked in the barn—no package. You're in it, Justin. You've got to help me. I can't help myself. Five thousand of them! And then, of course, I couldn't pull the second half of the job. Clardy was right..."

He stood up, swaying a little. "Come along, Justin. You've got to do something for me."

Gribble lurched through the doorway, past the latched-back screen door, down the cement walk to the road.

Justin followed slowly. "It's about fifteen miles," Gribble said over his shoulder.

"I've got to go along, Justin told himself. The little man's guessed—and he's right—that I'm a traitor to the People's Democratic Republic. He might tell anybody if it takes his fancy. Perhaps, he bleakly thought, I'll have to kill him. Meanwhile, he doesn't get out of my sight."

"What do you want me to do, exactly?" he asked Gribble in a calm, reasonable voice.

The little man said abruptly: "Open a door."

VIII

THEY walked for two hours, Gribble in the lead and mumbling.

Justin tried at first to get him to make sense, then to at least accept a cover story. "We're going to Bert Loughlin's about a calf, Gribble. Okay? Will you tell them that if we get stopped? Bert Loughlin's about a calf..."

"Cobalt," Gribble said, preoccupied. Six miles along the road they were overtaken by a wagon, Eino Haaras at the reins. He was returning from Clayboro to Glencairn—"Little Finland"—with locust poles. He scowled at them and offered a ride.

"Thanks," Gribble said. "We're going to see Bert Loughlin about a calf."

Baaras shrugged and waited for them to get up before he said: "Loughlin ain't got no calf." He touched up the team and the wagon rolled.

"Selling, not buying," Justin said. "Loughlin ain't got no money," Baaras said unconcernedly.

"Maybe something to swap," Justin said. He was clenching his fists. What came next? Loughlin ain't got nothing to swap. Where you really headed, Yustin! But Baaras just dipped some snuff, spat into the dust and said nothing.

Silent Finn, Justin thought, suddenly drowsy with the afternoon heat. Worse for them than for us. They've been followed halfway around the world by the neighbors they fed while we sat and waited and perhaps were happy in our blindness...

He dozed for a while; Gribble shook him awake. "We get off here, Mr. Justin." The wagon had stopped and Baaras was sardonically smiling.

"Thanks," he said to the Finn, and looked uncertainly at Gribble for a lead. The little man started up a rutted and inconspicuous wagon track that angled from the black top, Justin followed him, disoriented for a moment. Then he realized that they were on the west side of Prospect Hill and heading up it.

Baaras looked at them, shrugged and drove on. Justin thought flatly: a total botch. I said the wrong thing, we got off at the wrong place. I couldn't have botched it worse if I'd been waving a flag with TRAITOR embroidered on it. The only thing to do now is wait and hope. Baaras is going to talk about my peculiar goings-on, and the people he talks to will talk. Eventually I'll get to somebody like Croley and that means I'm dead.

Meanwhile, you keep climbing Prospect Hill.

THE HILL was about twenty-five hundred feet high and heavily wooded. It was supposed to be owned by one of the great New York real-estate fortunes. Farmers who tried to buy small pieces adjoining their fields for wood lots were rebuffed. A fair-sized local mutual insurance company that tried once to buy a big piece for development got an interview in New York City and a courteous explanation that the Hill was being held against the possibility that the area would experience major growth. The president of the company considered that interview one of the high points of his life, and Justin had heard all about it. So had practically everybody who spent ten minutes with the president.

The Hill was posted against hunting and fishing, but not fenced in. Farmers around it had more or less fenced it out with their own wire, but there were gaps like the one Gribble had found. Kids and hunters stayed clear of the Hill for the most part. Among the kids there was a legend that the Vanderbilts—or was it the Astors?—would jail you for twenty years if you got caught trespassing. And the hunters knew that the Hill had no springs and only one intermittent stream. It was against local custom to carry a canteen for a day's hunting; you were heavily joshed for dressing up like a Boy Scout. So you pretty much stayed away...

But what wheels had worn the twin ruts up the Hill?

Justin kicked at an angle of crushed rock. It should have blown up and away from the loose gravel it was embedded in and Justin should have strode on feeling infinitesimally better for the release of tension. It didn't happen that way at all. The rock stayed where it was and blinding pain shot through Justin's foot. While he stopped and swore Gribble turned. "Wasting time," he said mildly.

"In a minute," Justin said. The pain was dying down, but he wasn't ready to go on walking. He stooped and tried to wiggle the fang of rock protruding from the gravel, work it loose and throw it away. It had wounded him and it must surely die.

The rock wouldn't budge. Evidently it was a protruding corner of a really big chunk. He pawed at the loose gravel to investigate. It wasn't loose gravel. His fingers skidded over the surface without dislodging a single one of the round and oval glacier-ground stones.

"Come on," Gribble said impatiently, and resumed climbing. Justin followed thoughtfully. The rutted worn secondary road, this road that was clearly on the very verge of breaking up, was a very remarkable road indeed. It looked bad. It was bad. It would give the springs of a truck a very hard time.

But it would never get worse. It would never break up. It was a good road disguised as a bad one. Reinforced concrete a yard down, no doubt. On top of that the crushed rock and gravel mortared into position. A heavy-duty highway that would pass air reconnaissance and even a ground patrol.

"Yes, yes, yes," Gribble was muttering ahead of him.

A heavy-duty highway to where?

As he spoke he moved up and down a few yards of the steeply inclined end of the road, like a hound trying to pick up a scent. Now and then he knelt and fingered a stone.

"All that planning," he chattered, "and then in a weak moment they turned it over to me. A fuzzy-faced West Point second classman who had been better, of course. I was supposed to be a hard guy. Once I signed orders for a twenty-percent firing effective Christmas Eve. Deliberately, to make the surviving eighty percent crack a little. But there's a difference . . ."

He had found whatever he was looking for. "Lift here," he told Justin, indicating two shards of concrete that projected from the good road. His face was deathly pale.

Justin hadn't been listening. He had been thinking: A total breakdown. He's completely irresponsible, in a dream-world. He's likely to say anything to anybody. Perhaps I ought to pick one of these reinforcing rods over there and . . .

"What's that?" he asked the little man.

Gribble patiently repeated: "Lift here, and showed him the hunks of concrete."

"Murder was on Justin's mind. "Stand over there," he said sharply. He wasn't to be caught bending over with the lunatic behind him and ruin his facing rods conveniently near Gribble, pale and exhausted, stood where he pointed, yards away, and nevertheless Justin watched him as he heaved on the shards. Because that he missed seeing the miracle, but he felt its weight through his back and shoulder muscles and heard its creak and hum.

A great slab of the good-road rock came up like a door, twelve feet wide, easily twenty feet long. He crazily thought at first that he had pried it up with his fingers, and then he heard a motor and the whine of a gearbox.

Justin leaped back and the hinged slab continued to rise. It was a yard thick, supported on I-beams.

To where?

The good-road road ended at the gateway to a tunnel angling sharply down. At the gateway the mass parade ended. The tunnel flooring was plain concrete. Lights had gone on, one every couple of yards along the ceiling. He had a confused impression of huge counterweights moving down as the slab moved up, and then motion stopped; the tunnel lay open.

Gribble's voice penetrated his stupor. "Come on, Justin. Inside." He stepped in and let Gribble shove him a lever which he pulled, and which lowered the ponderous slab down on them again. He let Gribble, stammering and sweating, lead him a hundred feet down the inclined tunnel to a huge door, to Justin's eyes exactly like that of a bank vault.

"That's it," Gribble said, his voice charged with poisonous self-hatred. "Open it, Justin."

The artist stammered a question about the combination. Gribble whispered: "No combination. Just that lever . . ."

No, it wasn't like a bank vault's door after all. There was just the one lever. This door was meant to open easily. From the outside.

Justin turned the lever and pulled. The door slid open and a stard concentration-camp corpse tumbled out into the tunnel. Justin leaped back; his own scream of horror yelled back

The techniques the Scandinavians developed, plus the brute-force Manhattan District's clear security plan borrowed from the Japanese and improved on by the supply system of the Czarist Army. The one that kept losing them all their wars."

Justin hadn't been listening. He had been thinking: A total breakdown. He's completely irresponsible, in a dream-world. He's likely to say anything to anybody. Perhaps I ought to pick one of these reinforcing rods over there and . . .

"What's that?" he asked the little man.

Gribble patiently repeated: "Lift here, and showed him the hunks of concrete."

"Murder was on Justin's mind. "Stand over there," he said sharply. He wasn't to be caught bending over with the lunatic behind him and ruin his facing rods conveniently near Gribble, pale and exhausted, stood where he pointed, yards away, and nevertheless Justin watched him as he heaved on the shards. Because that he missed seeing the miracle, but he felt its weight through his back and shoulder muscles and heard its creak and hum.

A great slab of the good-road rock came up like a door, twelve feet wide, easily twenty feet long. He crazily thought at first that he had pried it up with his fingers, and then he heard a motor and the whine of a gearbox.

Justin leaped back and the hinged slab continued to rise. It was a yard thick, supported on I-beams.

To where?

The good-road road ended at the gateway to a tunnel angling sharply down. At the gateway the mass parade ended. The tunnel flooring was plain concrete. Lights had gone on, one every couple of yards along the ceiling. He had a confused impression of huge counterweights moving down as the slab moved up, and then motion stopped; the tunnel lay open.

Gribble's voice penetrated his stupor. "Come on, Justin. Inside." He stepped in and let Gribble shove him a lever which he pulled, and which lowered the ponderous slab down on them again. He let Gribble, stammering and sweating, lead him a hundred feet down the inclined tunnel to a huge door, to Justin's eyes exactly like that of a bank vault.

"That's it," Gribble said, his voice charged with poisonous self-hatred. "Open it, Justin."

The artist stammered a question about the combination. Gribble whispered: "No combination. Just that lever . . ."

No, it wasn't like a bank vault's door after all. There was just the one lever. This door was meant to open easily. From the outside.

Justin turned the lever and pulled. The door slid open and a stard concentration-camp corpse tumbled out into the tunnel. Justin leaped back; his own scream of horror yelled back at him, reverberating along the tunnel's smooth walls.

He was turning to run blindly back when Gribble took his arm. "Look at them," Gribble said softly. "There was no pain. I was never sure of that. Naturally I was told it would be painless, but they'd tell me that anyway. But it was true. They never knew what hit them, Justin. I feel just a little better now."

Justin finally forced himself to look. There was no distortion of agony on the faces; they were people who had gone to sleep and never wakened. He became conscious of a cool, dry, gentle draft from the open doorway. "Pseudonummies," Gribble said. "You find them in high dry places. The Andes, the Iranian upland." He looked earnestly into one of the calm faces. "Dr. Swenson. A very good man. I suppose he guessed what had happened, got a few people together and went to work on the door. Quietly—no panic."

The dry, brown hand of the man he looked down at was cramped around the twin pipe of an oxyacetylene torch. Another pair of dry brown arms held cylinders of gas. Another had been straightening a kinked tube when time became eternity.

"No panic," Gribble mused. "His watchword used to be 'step back and take a long, calm look.' He kept us together after the polio epidemic. I for one was ready to yell for help. 'Step back . . .' he said, and I did and we decided we could swing it as we were. That Swenson. He felt the air go cold and dry, he figured it out, he got his men together, they got to work on the door. And then the gas came. Without pain."

All Justin could make of it was that Gribble had killed—or thought he had killed—some people beyond the door. "Tell me about it," he said calmly.

"I'll show you," said the little man. "After all, it's your baby now. I couldn't be expected to go on with it now, could I?" His eyes were wild.

"Of course not." Justin said very steadily. "You just show me what you have to and don't worry. I'll see that the right thing's done."

"Come on," Gribble said.

THEY stepped around the bodies and through the door into a garage. The little man absently went from wall to wall turning on lights. It was quite a place, and it was crowded with servicing equipment and trucks. No two trucks were built alike, painted alike or marked alike. Some of them Justin vaguely recognized. There was the two-ton stake-bed job, very battered, marked P. DiPumpo & Sons, Contractors. He had absent-mindedly registered the odd name a few times during the past few years. The battered truck of P. DiPumpo and Sons had intersected his orbit on the highway, or in town, or perhaps during the early months of the war passing his farm. Trucks came and went.

A half-ton cab-over-engine job: Harnell Florists.

A huge, ordinary, bright-red gas truck: Sapeco Refining Company.

A tractor-trailer job, special trailer with the bed sunk between the axles: U. S. Bridge Building Corporation. He had seen that one, noticing the odd profile of a bulky load covered with roped tarpaulins.

Thirty more of them, reefers, pickups, vans, dumpers, tow cars—you name it and it was there. Two hundred feet under Prospect Hill was a haunted garage with dry, brown people sprawled here and there, as they would fall from turning an engine, cleaning spark plugs, turning down brake drums, and—in one small corner—stagnating out counterfeited license plates for 1966.

In the rock was a rocket to circle the earth and wipe out whole sinful cities

"Come on," Gribble said again.

He led Justin from the garage into a bewildering underground industrial complex. There were drafting rooms, with dry brown draftsmen slumped forward on their tables. Offices, foundries, machine shops, welding bays, sheet-metal shops, laboratories, and desiccated corpses everywhere. Gribble kept pausing to look into faces. Sometimes he would name a name; usually he would turn to Justin and ask shrilly whether it wasn't obvious that they had died painlessly and in peace. Justin reassured him over and over again.

The living quarters, below the working level, were the same. Spartan cubicles tunneling deep into the hill—Justin guessed dazedly that there might be five thousand of them strung along twenty corridors radiating from a plaza. The library, the cafeteria, the gymnasium. Sun lamps there, of course. And brown figures sprawled on the board track that circled it.

"What was it?" he had been asking for some time now of the unhearing little man. "I can't help, if I don't know what it was, Gribble."

The little man led the way up from the living quarters to a freight elevator on the manufacturing level. He jerked the starting cable and the platform rose slowly with them to a square of blackness in the roof. . . . "The satellite," Gribble said. "The super-gadget, the ultimate doohickey that was going to win the war and keep it won."

"The satellite's lost, Gribble," Justin said evenly. "They overran it in the sweep south. Betsy Cardew told me about it."

Gribble looked at him scornfully. "Not that one, you bloody fool," he said. "This one. The real one."

The freight elevator passed through the square of blackness and lights went on in a huge domed chamber of rock. In the centre of the chamber stood a towering, spidery structure. Even Justin's untrained eye could see that it was a three-step rocket. Even he could see that the third step was designed to circle the earth as an artificial satellite. And that it was heavily armed with bomb-launching racks.

YOU'RE a well-read average man, thought Billy Justin, so you're aware that the human race is about to take its next giant step. It's a pity that it takes a war to do it, but that seems to be the way people are. British imperial greed long ago caused a Mr. John Harrison to fuse metallurgy, physics and genius into the first marine chronometer, by means of which the captains of His Britannic Majesty's Navy were able to find a not-yet-plundered island twice in succession. Before that Signor Tartaglia, under the necessity of battering down medieval walls sheltering medieval thugs for the benefit of Renaissance thugs with Renaissance cannon, stole sine cosine and tangent from the philosopher's toy chest and gave them to the world for tools. You know it was war that put jigs and fixtures on our machine tools, which is to say mass production: muskets to sewing machines, washers, kitchenware, Grand Rapids furniture and the American standard of living. And another put plasmas in the air. And another avalanched radar, atomic bombs and the first crude space-ships on us. You knew, therefore, like everybody else, that the current war was going to bring space flight, particularly the bombardment satellite Yankee Doodle—a building in the north-west somewhere in Alaska. The marvellous satellite would circle the earth like the eye of God, but improved by American ingenuity; its more-than-Jovian thunderbolts were to strike down not one sinner at a time but whole sinful cities and—if they didn't disperse into ineffectiveness—sinful army groups. It was going to be a harsh, just world for sinners when the satellite Yankee Doodle roared up to begin its swift circling of the heavens, troubled though the progress of its construction was by sabotage. Troubled though it was by paratroopers. And there wasn't a dry eye in the house when the radio told you how Yankee Doodle was steamrolled by the fifty thousand death-or-glory Chinese fanatics, hopped up to the eyebrows, of Task Force Tsing. The announcer brokenly announced: "Our men and women fought to the end against the human sea that engulfed them. The last weak radio communication from the site announced that thermite and demolition bombs had been fired to utterly destroy all components of Yankee Doodle so that the fanatical barbarian invaders. . . ."

"Not that one, you bloody fool. This one. The real one."

BILLY JUSTIN craned his neck to study the monster. Its nose was lost in the upper gloom of the chamber. He emitted a sound like a nervous giggle. "I never thought we were that smart," he breathed.

Gribble was very happy. "This was the ultimate in the pleasurable game of giving away confidences. "It's nothing new," he said with elaborate casualness. "We suckered the Germans this way when we invaded Europe the last time. There was this Army Group, see, waiting in England to make the real attack on the Pas de Calais. The Germans knew it; they knew Patton was in command, they intercepted the radio traffic of the Army Group every day. Orders, acknowledgments, rations, troop movements, supplies, personnel transfers. So they almost ignored the feint by Bradley on the Cotentin Peninsula; they held forty divisions ready to meet the real thrust by Patton's Army Group. When it was too late they found out that Patton's Army Group consisted of Patton and a couple of hundred radio operators. By then Bradley had broken out and was chewing his way across France."

"It is—ready?" asked Justin.

"No." "The little man squatted on the concrete. "I'll begin at the beginning. You've got to know it all anyway."

"Why?" Justin asked sharply.

Gribble screwed up his face and his eyes began to leak tears. "I thought you agreed," he said miserably. "Didn't you say you'd handle it? I'm shot, Justin! I can't take any more..." His voice was soaring into childish shrillness.

"All right," Justin said hastily. "All right. Don't worry about a thing. If I've got to, I've got to. Just tell me."

Gribble blew his nose and shuddered. Shrilly at first, then more easily, he said: "It hasn't got any name. It's a three-step hydrazine-fueled booster ment satellite. It has a fishbow reactor for housekeeping current. It has a hydroponics room in action now under nine lamps. It's built for two. The TV stage and film library includes fifty thousand movies and books. An all-transistor radio sending and receiving set will function for an estimated seventy-five years without requiring servicing. Efficient waste and water regenerators are patterned after those aboard our long-cruise atomic submarines. Up there you can see the bomb deck, which accounts for half the weight of the third stage—rejecting fuel. A radar-computer bomb sight is capable of directing missiles to any point on the earth's surface; delivery within five square miles is guaranteed. The satellite is armed with thirty-six hydrogen bombs and two special cobalt-jacketed bombs. I don't know why I'm telling you all this. You must have been reading about it since 1950."

Justin nodded. He had, sandwiched between do-it-yourself pieces in the mechanics magazines, sandwiched between boy-and-girl stories in the slicks. He had. Everybody had. And here it was...

"Well, 1950's when it began. 1950's when I went to Clardy and offered my services. 1950's when all those ads appeared everywhere for engineers, scientists, technicians, toolmakers, mechanics. Remember the deluge?"

He did. Suddenly the United States seemed to have been gripped by a terrible hunger for trained men. It was as if—as if they were being drained off the normal labor supply. He said as much.

"That's right. And we're the ones who drained them off. We recruited for a year. Half the ads you saw during that time might have been genuine; the rest were ours. From '51 on they were all genuine, and believe me, the aircraft and electronics industries were desperate. We'd drained off five thousand of the best people in the country. I sat in hotel rooms—Mr. Simpson of Aero Research, Mr. Blair of Pasadena Electronics—and interviewed around the clock. So did fifty others. We boiled down two hundred thousand people to five thousand."

"All the final selections knew was, 'hard, interesting, remunerative work, draft-proof but with a spice of danger.' When our table of organizations was filled we had the darndest collection of specialists ever assembled and practically every one of them could double in construction work and the rest could learn. We tracked them in April '51 to Prospect Hill. The construction and excavating machinery was here. I made my little speech telling 'em they were dead for the duration to the outside world. No passes, no furloughs, no anything. You see, Justin, there were spies among them. Had to be. But what's wrong with a spy if he's a good worker and can't get word outside the project? My security boys shot four people who tried to sneak out in the first month and after that nobody tried. Were they spies? I don't know. Or care. They'd been warned...

"Nobody brought supplies to us; we went for our own. With my boys riding alone in the cabs of my trucks. There'd be a freight car at an abandoned factory siding, we'd transfer the load and that was that. We were under canvas through the first winter, but the Hill was beginning to take shape. It was the best cave in the northeast. We enlarged it, braced it, squared it up."

"They were wonderful boys and girls, Justin. I don't know how to tell you. You know what a commie means in prison? That's how we treated them. Work gangs of twenty, always, and my security people roving around with whistles and guns. How the whistle at a gang, everybody stops everybody and comes to attention and then you count them. If it's nineteen or twenty-one you check. Immediately. Well, somehow they managed not to mind it. Maybe they were thinking of the pay cheques piling up against their accounts, maybe they were worked too hard to care, but maybe they knew they were shock troops too."

"The last of them was underground by October of '52. It was still primitive in here—camp cuts, no privacy, lousy food. Three good men went violently insane. What could we do? We locked 'em up and our medics cared for them and one of them recovered. We started stockpiling structural members for the satellite that winter. By then they knew what they were working on. Terrible life. And by the '52, well, it was a good thing we had a computer man who also happened to be an ordained minister. Yes, Justin, I didn't show you the nursery, I think I'm behaving very well, but the nursery would be just a little more than I could take..."

HE BEGAN to cry silently. Justin got up and walked the circuit of the huge ship's base. When he returned Gribble was dry-eyed. "We acquired more trucks at that point," the little man said precisely. "For one year we did very little but warehouse supplies. Between times we improved our living quarters and recreational facilities. The monotony the work had had an effect. There were fads for painting, sculpture and intramural competitive sports. I had to crack down on the waste of time and became utterly unpopular, which I was used to. The little steno back in my insurance days called me 'The Monster,' you know. Things took an upturn when actual construction of the satellite began."

"The next year something unusual happened. There was somebody in one of those freight cars at one of those sidings. They brought him to me. He was a CIA man, and he knew he'd never be able to leave and the operation was over one way or another. He had a message that was a little too hot for our code room, since it involved code-room personnel as well as the rest of us. Luckily—or by design—he was a former cafeteria manager, and was responsible for a great improvement in our mess. But the message, the message... when I decoded it in my own quarters I laughed and said 'Maddams.' And I went ahead and obeyed it. It was to install, under the guise of an air-conditioning device, masked tanks of lethal gas. And I was placed under standing orders to release the gas if certain circumstances should arise. Melodrama.

"The war came, of course. They worked like demons; our medics had very little to do except circulate and snarl at sick people to lie down for a half hour if they didn't want to drop in their tracks. Our supplies chief broke down from frustration when supplies became a trickle, an erratic one. Our sponsors in the defense department could hardly tell a desperate major-general whose division was headed for Yellowknife without anti-tank guns that rail space was needed for something nebulous but infinitely more important. Or the navy that a carrier launching must be postponed two months because control-system components had to be shoved down a hole in Prospect Hill.

"Many, many times our trucks went to the appointed places at the appointed times and found only half a dozen crates in the freight car—or no freight car at all. Thank God, the bombs came through. AEC must have interlocked with our operation somehow; they never shorted us, ever.

"We had a polio epidemic last year, Justin! And no vaccine! It swept through our electronics department like a prairie fire. We lost a dozen of our best men. Scores of them were crippled to the point where they could work only at benches, assembling. Only three men who really knew what they were doing were left to climb around the girders installing and testing. Volunteers made a lot of mistakes which the specialists had to undo. But things were drawing to a close. Our pilot and bombardier arrived and trained on the controls. They were good boys, just right for the job.

"It's an awesome thing, Justin. That roof up there—it's skilfully undermined. Push the button and it blasts away the crest of the hill and we stand open to the sky. One bright young man does the right things with the controls and the satellite soars and circles. The other young man does the right things with his controls and she spits hydrogen bombs one thousand miles straight down at speed far beyond detection or interception. That was to end the war, Justin. Thirty-six hell bombs. And to keep it ended, to prove to the enemy the final insanity of continuing, there are the two specials with their cobalt jackets. Drop one special somewhere over Finland. It blows, generating lethal radioactive dust. Southwesterly winds drift the dust across most of Russia, wiping out all plant and animal life in its path. The other cobalt job's for China, even though the dust would kill as far as California. Last-chance weapons, Justin. Almost-but-not-quite-bluffs. Break glass only in case of insane continued resistance after thirty-six H-bombs destroy thirty-six Russian and Chinese population centres.

"Very close, Justin. Very close. A few hundred man-hours of electronics installation remaining, a few hundred components to procure. But then there was the surrender broadcast and my orders were clear. This was what the spies in the operation had been waiting for. Come hell or high water they'd get out and turn us in. My orders were—One, to release the gas in case of military defeat and capitulation. And—Two, to contact responsible parties,

"Thirty-six lousy bombs and two specials," Justin thought. "Well, in the rocket you could wipe out Russia and China" assuming leadership of a project to complete and launch the satellite.

"I carried out the first half, Justin. You'll help me, won't you? They really can't expect a person who's been through so much to keep on going, can they? Is it reasonable? Is it fair?" His eyes were looking again.

"If you only knew," he groaned, surrounded by his five thousand dead, immersed in his guilt.

"We've got to get out of here," Justin said quietly. "We've got a long walk. Those cows'll be howling to be milked. Somebody might notice."

A last look at the towering satellite and they started home to milk the cows.

THIE SHELVES at Croley's store were filling up. Farm supplies were coming back. For the first time in three years neat tubes of aureomycin ointment for udder sores were neatly stacked in the old space on the shelf. Under the familiar red trademark was something new in small type about the State Antibiotics Trust. That was perfectly all right with Justin; they could call it anything they wanted as long as they were pitching in to keep his milk production up.

And then he sneered at himself for the thought. It was exactly the thought they wanted him to have, and they wanted him to chop it off right there. Not to go on and reflect: milk production for whom, where?

Half a dozen farmers were waiting for Croley. The old man came out of his miniature office, looked blankly at them and went back in again. They sighed, studied the salt pork in his meat case, the sacks of rice from Louisiana—back after two years—and the comic books. Billy Spencer, Northeast Farmer, True Life Heroes, the Story of Klaus Fuchs. Justin flipped through them, waiting. Billy Spencer was a clean-cut kid who lived only to make his milk norm and thereby build peace and the North American People's Democratic Republic. Disaster threatened when his butterfat production slumped fifty percent and all the other kids jeered at him. But one night he saw a sinister figure skulking around his barn and who should it be but Benny Repler, the loudest of the jeerers. Benny, caught in the act of administering an unspecified slow poison to Billy's cows, broke down and confessed he was a tool of unreconstructed capitalist traitor-saboteurs, and was marched off, head high, to expiate his sins by hard labor for the NAFDR. Billy, in a final blazing double spread, was awarded a Hero of Agricultural Labor medal by the President himself, and took the occasion to emit a hundred-word dialogue balloon pledging himself anew to the cause of peace and the people's democracy under its great protector the Soviet Union.

And as for Fuchs, the saintly work-scientist in his long martyrdom at Wormwood Scrubs Prison—Justin carefully closed the comic book and replaced it in its wire rack. Croley had emerged from his office again with a wrapped parcel. You could tell from the size and the neck that it was a quart bottle. "One of you call Perce," he said to the farmers. His half-witted helper was lounging in the sun on the bench outside. Justin was nearest the door. "Mr. Croley wants you," he told the boy.

The storekeeper handed Perce the wrapped bottle and told him: "Like yesterday. For the soldiers up at the truck station."

Perce giggled slyly: "Soup for lunch. Like yesterday." He glanced at the farmers to see that they got his joke. They were as stone-faced as Croley and he went on his way. Croley stared sullenly at the first man in line—his way of asking: "May I help you, sir?" A haggard began about tobacco. Croley was an industrialist now; he had started a small seedshop business in Norton. Somewhere he had located a hule of prewar king-size cigarette papers; the widows and orphans of Norton worked at home turning them into Norton-style cigarettes with cardboard mouthpieces at a cent a dozen. With dependency allotments from the

Let's see, then. One H-bomb for Croley left thirty-five. One H-bomb for the 49th SMGU left thirty-four. If they weren't skipping numbers, that left at least 448 SMGUs to be H-bombed, leaving a deficit of 414 bombs if you didn't count the cobalt-jacketed specials, and what were they good for?

Well, you could wipe out Russia and China, including the slave laborers who used to be the North American Armies. This would leave the occupying troops here cut off from their home bases but still top dogs with their weapons, armor and aviation. There was no reason to believe that their political bosses at home did not exert a moderating influence on the military commanders here.

And of course you couldn't even find anybody who could locate the electronics men and crewmen you needed to fire the big gun at the line. Rawson? A hardboiled ex-sergeant, ex-hobo, probably ex-pretty criminal, somehow involved in a bomb-smuggling ring of unknown potentialities. He had not dared tell Rawson; the thing was too big for the legless man, too big for anybody who thought only in rough-and-ready action terms.

THIE battered, unpainted Kooka bus stopped outside the store with a squeak. Justin glanced at the schedule and the clock. It was thirty-five minutes late—about average for the service.

He recognized the man who swung down from the door. It was Croley. The salesman. The bomb-runner. Be-Jay Farm Supplies and Machinery, Lansington, Penna. The man pleasantly elbowed his way through the crowd, explaining to one and all: "I don't want to speak in the line, gentlemen, but you'll think me for it in the long run. The driver tells me—How are you Mr. Croley?—the driver says we're stopping for ten minutes to let the engine cool down. I thought that was Mr. C. in on the big news. Gentlemen, we have milk cans here, ready for delivery and I'm sure you're all glad to hear it. Mr. Croley, would you be interested in six dozen hundred-pound tin-lined steel milk cans of the Emoss Be-Jay quality for your customers?" He had his order book out.

"C'm into the office," Croley growled and they disappeared. Justin was at a packing up all over," a little old man said hopefully to Justin. "If the price's right I could use a dozen myself. Sick of scouring and packing the old cans. Don't you think things are picking up now?"

Somebody else snapped: "For Croley they are. Crooked skunk." The little man looked alarmed and started to move away. The dangerous talker—Justin thought—was the brother of the Eldridge brothers from Four Corners—the little man's arm and began pouring into his ears a tale of how Croley paid off every week to a SMGU major who pretended to inspect his freight room.

"Mebbe, mebbe," the little man kept saying as he tried to get away.

Justin told himself: there's my man: in Croley's office. I wait for him to come out. I walk along as he heads for the bus, we whisper an appointment and I meet him somewhere. And then, thank God, it'll be over. No more bombardment satellite for me. A small consoling grin somewhere would take it over, do what has to be done. I'll have done my share, I'll army discontinued, it fended off starvation.

"Last batch stunk," Croley said flatly. "Dime a pound and that's that. Should be glad to make a payment on your bill, Hunzicker."

Hunzicker looked half around, shame on his face; everybody studiously avoided his eye. Justin wished the conventional wail that he could sink into the earth rather than see Hunzicker's shame and Croley's gloomy arrogance.

"Right," the farmer muttered. "Dime a pound. But it's better than last time. You'll see." Croley stared, impassive. He sold the cigarettes to the garrison at Chunga Center. The 49th Soviet Military Government Unit winked at such rampant capitalism when it was practiced by handy, steady, centrally located Mr. Croley.

Bomb him, Justin thought vacantly. Bombardment satellite's ready and waiting, short a few hundred man-hours and a crew. Find yourself the engineers and the crewmen, send 'em up and then they drop an H-bomb on Mr. Croley and all's well.

Thirty-six lousy bombs and two specials.

He remembered a story by H. G. Wells in which the world had been threatened by nothing more than intelligent, three-inch ants. A gunboat captain—what else could he do?—fired the big gun at the ants and steamed away knowing that he had accomplished nothing and furthermore would catch hell for shooting off the expensive ammunition.

snatch and secretly know that some day I'll be in the history books as the daring civilian who contacted the organization at the risk of his life . . .

It didn't work out that way at all. The bus driver called: "Board!" and the salesman appeared at the door of the little office, still talking to Croley and shaking hands. He talked Croley out through the door of the shop with him, waving up the steps of the bus still talking and collapsed comfortably into a dirty oldcloth-covered seat while Justin gaped and the bus chugged off down the road.

Justin broken.

Justin found himself swearing, almost frenzied, as he stamped along the dirt track to the Shiptons' wood lot. The flies were bad in the summer heat; he slapped viciously at them missing oftener than not, knowing that frustration was making him behave like an idiot. But he had to dump this load!

Rawson came into sight about where they told him he'd be. The crippled veteran was strapped into his gocart, leaning far out to bore a hole with a post auger. The Shipton milk quota had been stepped up again. To meet it they'd have to breed their heifers early; to feed the calves that would come they needed more pasture. So here was Rawson boring post holes to enclose land supposed to be set aside as wood lot for the future.

Justin hailed the legless man abruptly. Rawson gave the pipe handle of the auger a final turn and hauled it up, loaded with sandy clay, his huge shoulder muscles bulging. "Good day's work," he said proudly. "What brings you here, Billy?"

"I know where the bombardment satellite is," Justin said flatly.

Rawson grinned. "Why, so do I. Poor old Yankee Doodle's a few miles south of Yellowknife, what's left of her. Too bad they didn't get her up in time."

"I mean the real one," Justin said. "Yankee Doodle is deception. I know where the real one is. Rawson, you've got to put me in touch with your higher ups. Don't mess with me, Rawson! You've got something to do with the suitcase A-bombs. I saw that salesman who picked up the assembly from me that time. He was in Croley's store but he was gone before I had a chance to talk to him."

"Nearby?" Rawson asked thoughtfully.

"Skip that. Just let me know who's your boss and how to get in touch. I want to dump this business. I don't know what to do with it, where to begin. I've got to turn it over to somebody."

"You're nuts," Rawson said. "I don't know about any A-bombs and you don't know about any bombardment satellites lying around. What A-bomb was this—that liquor you helped me out with?"

"Liquor be damned! Who's your boss?"

"Convince me, Billy. You haven't yet. And if it'll help you talk, you might as well know I used to be, in my time, the youngest general officer in the Corps of Engineers."

"You're in command?"

"Of what? I'm not giving information, Billy. I'm only taking today." So, Justin thought bitterly, I don't get to lay it down. Instead I get involved deeper. Now I have the burden of Rawson's identity on me—unless he's lying or crazy. He began to talk.

Gribble, the psychosis, the satellite. When there was no more to tell, the legless man said: "Very circumstantial. Maybe even true."

"You'll take it from here?" Justin demanded.

"Go home and wait, Billy. Just go home and wait." Rawson shoved his gocart five feet farther down the line and stabbed his auger into the sod for the next post hole.

Justin started down the dirt path, the burden still on his back. He thought of blood-spattered cellar walls against which men exactly like him, but with less than a millionth of the guilty knowledge he possessed, were beaten and killed. When would they let Billy Justin be Billy Justin again? It went far back into childhood, his involvement. Were the old wars like this rolling, continuous thing of which he had been a part for as long as he could remember, this thing that would not end even now that it was ended? Item: childhood games. Item: high-school ROTC. Item: propaganda poster contests. Item: Korea (and an infected leg wound from a dirty, nameless little patrol). Item: War Three (and cows). Item: defeat and occupation. And still he was entangled in spite of his fatigue, his hundred-times-earned honorable discharge.

JUSTIN waited through two weeks of summer drought and flies, having the minimum of talk with Gribble, collapsing every night in exhaustion. They came very close to meeting their milk norm.

The signal was a long blast of the milkwoman's horn—it meant registered mail, an insured package or something of the sort. Justin climbed the steep short hill to the mailbox suspecting nothing more. But Betsy Cardow told him: "Think up a good reason. You're going to Chianga Center with me."

"Rawson?" he asked. She nodded.

"Can you wait while I throw a bucket of water over myself and change my shirt?"

"I can't. Please get in." They suggested the long mail route almost without conversing. She had nothing to say except that he would meet some people. He tried to tell her that she shouldn't be mixed up in anything like this and she said she had a job. They had to have the mail carriers. And, after reflecting, he realized that they did. Mail carriers were daily travelers who met everybody and carried packages as part of the job. Mail carriers were essential, and if one of them happened to be a slim, clear-eyed girl entirely unsuited for torture and death in a cellar, so much the worse for her.

She showed no fear at the check points. The Red Army men who stopped her and signed her through on their registers were friendly. She said to them: "Prokator'ye, čtož bezpokožajuyoz' sus," while Justin stared and the soldiers grinned.

"Very difficult language," she told Justin as they drove on. "I'm making slow progress."

"Those soldiers looked pretty sloppy to me."

"Colonel Platoff's got a girl. Mrs. Grauer."

Justin whistled. The Grauers were Chianga Center aristocracy. Young Mr. Grauer was president by primumogeniture of the feed mill. Mrs. Grauer was an imported Wellesley girl and very slim and lovely. The husband, of course, was whereabouts unknown after surrendering his National Guard regiment in the debacle at Edmonton.

"Goes right to the house!" he asked.

"Right to the big red-brick Georgian showplace," she said, concentrating on her driving. "I don't know if they're in love or not. There's an awful lot of it going on."

So Colonel Platoff had a girl and the soldiers at the check points had murky brass and had skipped shaving. The sidlerly virtue was running fast out of SMGU 449. Justin was suddenly more conscious than ever that he smelled like what he was: a farmer in a mid-summer drought.

Justin got out when they reached the post office by late afternoon. Betsy Cardew said she had two hours of sorting ahead of her, and would be meet her at her house on Chianga Hill.

He wandered through the town unmolested. Mr. Farish, the bald, athmatic young pharmacist, called to him from behind his prescription counter as he strolled down High Street. Mr. Farish and he had been fellow members of Rotary in the old days before the Farm-or-Fight laws, the membership of a free-lance commercial artist made Chianga Center Rotary more broadminded and cultured than the other chapters down the valley. They valued him for it, especially Mr. Farish who dlydreaded of escaping from pharmacy via a long historical novel he was writing.

Justin stepped into the store and nervously blurted out his cover story, an unconvincing bit about buying seedcake from the local feed store, Croley's price being too high for comfort.

Mr. Farish, completely uninterested, waved the yarn aside and set him up a nut beer. "Red Army boys are crazy about nut beer," he said. "Nothing like it where they come from."

"How're they behaving?"

"Pretty fair. Say, did you hear about Colonel Platoff and Mrs. —"

"I heard. Customer, Harry."

It was a Red soldier with a roll of film. "Seedcake?" he asked, grinning.

"Pyatnestsah," Mr. Farish told him.

"Okay?"

"Hokay," said the soldier. He contorted his face and brought out from the depths: "Soap?" And grinned with relief.

Mr. Farish sold him the soap and put away the film. "He wanted it on Wednesday and I told him Friday," he said casually. "You saw how he took it, Billy. There's no harm in them. Of course you farmers are eating a lot better than we are here but after they get food distribution squared away—"

Justin gulped his root beer and thanked Farish. He had to find out about that seedcake, he said, and hurried out. The bald young man looked hurt by his abruptness.

The bald young idiot!

He headed for one of the elm-shaded residential streets and paced its length, his hands rammed into the pockets of his jeans. Farish didn't know; Farish knew only that farmers were always griping. He didn't realize that the problem facing the Reds in the valley was to squeeze the maximum amount of milk from it and any time spent hatting the mercantile population around would be wasted. After the pattern was set, after the dairy farmers were automatic serfs, then they would move on the shopkeepers. Currently they were being used, and skillfully, to supply the garrison and the farms.

And still there was a nagging thought that these Red GIs were just human, and that their bosses were just human, that things seemed to be easing into a friendlier pattern of live-and-let-live.

And beneath that one there was the darker thought that it was too good to last, that somehow the gigantic self-regulating system would respond to the fact that Red GIs were treating the conquered population like friends and that Colonel Platoff had a girl.

An off-duty soldier and his girl were

Margaret smiled at the Russian. "Da, big boy, let's go." Off they went, arm in arm strolling the elm-shaded street with him, he noticed. The girl he vaguely recognized: one of those town drifters who serves your coffee at the diner one morning and the next day, to your surprise, is selling you crockery at the five-and-ten. Margaret something-or-other—

A sergeant bore down on the couple, and the soldier popped to attention, saluting. Without understanding the word Justin knew that he was witnessing a memorable chewing-out. The sitting, snarling Russian language was well suited to the purpose. When it ended at last the chastened soldier saluted, about-faced and marched down the street at attention, with Margaret something-or-other left standing flat-footed. The sergeant relaxed and smiled at her: "Kakoy, prekrasnoy, yuzovoyev!"

Margaret had her bearings again. She smiled back: "Da, big boy. Let's go," and off they went arm in arm.

Justin walked back to High Street, deeply disturbed. He liked what he had seen. It was too good, too warmly human, to be true.

MR. SPARHAWK was established on a crate at the corner of High and Onondaga outside the bank preaching to a thin crowd, none of whom stayed for more than a minute. The pinched British voice and the bony British face had not changed in the months since Justin last saw him. Neither had his line:

"My dear friends, we have peace at last. Some of you doubtless believe that it would be a better peace if it had been won by the victory of the North American Governments than by their adversaries, but this is vain thinking. Peace is indivisible, however attained. It is not what it has come out of but what we make of it. Reforming ourselves from within is the way in which we shall reform society. In the lonely individual heart begins what you are pleased to call progress. I rejoice that there is a diminished supply of meat and pray that this condition will reveal to you all the untruthfulness of the propaganda that meat is essential to health, and that from this realization many of you will progress to vegetarianism, the first great ascetic step toward universal life-reverence . . ."

Justin could not stand more than a minute of it himself. He headed north along Onondaga Street toward Chunga Hill and the big white house where Betsy lived. He knew why it hadn't yet been requisitioned, even after the guilty flight of her father, the National Committeeman. The Russians were supposed to live like Spartans in their barracks, officers faring not much better than the troops. But he thought he scented a trend in town that would end only with the expropriation of every decent dwelling in the Center.

The second and third floors of the house were closed off. There was still plenty of room for Betsy and a Mrs. Norse, the last of the servants. She was tottery and deaf; actually the two women waited on each other. Betsy matter-of-factly offered Justin a bath, which he eagerly accepted. When he emerged from the tub she called to him: "I've found some of my father's gardening things for you to put on. I don't suppose you want me to save your clothes?"

"No," he called back, embarrassed. "You caught me by surprise today; you know. I was wearing them just to clean the barn—"

"Of course," she said politely. "I'll have Mrs. Norse burn them, shall I?"

Clean socks, underwear, and clean, faded denims—he had to take up six inches of slack with his belt—left Justin feeling better than he had in months. Mrs. Norse was noisy about the improvement. She remembered the day when a man wouldn't dream of setting foot outside his bedroom unless he was decently clothed in a stiff collar, white shirt, tie and jacket. She told Justin about it and Betsy cooked dinner.

A panel truck pulled into the driveway while they were eating Spanish rice, the main dish. It proceeded to the back of the house, but Justin had time to read the lettering on it as it passed the window.

"Department of Agriculture," he said to Betsy. "And in smaller letters, Fish and Wildlife Survey."

She was blank-faced. "Go into the library when you've finished," she said. "Mrs. Norse and I will clean things up."

He found he was gobbling his Spanish rice and deliberately slowed down. Then the stuff balled in his mouth so he couldn't swallow.

"Excuse me," he said, gulping coffee and standing. He went into the library.

There were three men, all strangers, all middle-aged. One was the lean-little-gnomish Jewish type, one was heavy and spectacularly bald, one was a placid ox.

Mr. Ox said, "Put up your hands," and searched him. Mr. Egg said: "I hope you don't mind. We want to ask you some questions," and Justin knew at once who he was—the Hon. James Buchanan Wagner, junior senator from Michigan, nicknamed "Curly." He had shaved his head, and for safety's sake really ought to do something about his superb voice. Though perhaps, Justin thought, he as a commercial artist was a lot quicker than most to fill in the outlines of that bushy head.

Mr. Gnome said: "Sit down, please," and opened a brief case. He laid a light tray and variously colored tiles before Justin and said: "Put them in the tray any way you like." Justin built up a nice design for the man in about a minute and sat back.

Mr. Gnome said: "Look at this picture and tell me what it's about." The picture was very confusing, but after a moment Justin realized that it was a drawing of one man telling another man something, apparently a secret from their furtive expressions. He said so.

"Now what about this one?"
"Two men fighting. The big one's losing the fight."

"This one?"
"A horse—just a horse."

There were about fifty pictures. When they were run through Mr. Gnome switched to ink-blot cards which Justin identified as spiders, women, mirrors, and whatever else they looked like to him.

Every now and then Justin heard Senator Wagner distinctly mutter "fiddle-faddle," which did not surprise him. The senator, even as he who saw his duty to the United States and did it, was nevertheless not distinguished for broad-gauged liberal leadership.

There followed word-association lists. Not only did the gnomes hold a stop watch, but Mr. Ox calmly donned a stethoscope and put the button on Justin's wrist.

Then they seemed to be finished. The gnome told the senator: "I guess he's all right. Yes—he's either smarter than I am or he's all right. Sincere, not too neurotic, a reasonably effective person. For what it's worth, senator, I vouch for—"

The senator said angrily: "No names!"

Mr. Gnome shrugged. "His reaction time on 'Congress,' 'hair,' 'wagon'—he recognized you all right."

"Very well, doctor," rumbled the celebrated voice. "Mr. Justin, I wish to show you something." The senator turned down his collar on the right. He was still bitterly hostile—fundamentally scared, Justin realized, with two kinds of fear. There was the built-in animal fear of pain, mutilation, death. There was the abstract fear that one wrong decision at any stage of this dangerous game would blow sky-high any hope that America would rise again.

The senator was showing Justin a razor blade taped inside his collar. "You can seem merely to be easing your collar, Mr. Justin. With one swift move, however—so—you can slash your carotid artery beyond repair. Within seconds you will be dead. Your orders are not to be taken alive," the senator said. And he added grimly: "My psychologist friend indicates that you have sufficient moral fibre to carry them out." He tossed a blade and an inch of tape at Justin. "Put them on. Then tell your story. General Hollerith assures us through Miss Cardew that it is of the utmost importance."

"Is Hollerith Rawson?" Justin demanded.

"I don't recall his cover name. No legs," said the psychologist.

HIS FRIEND Rawson a general after all. Then what might not be true? The psychologist slipped out while Justin told Senator Wagner and Mr. Ox—of the FBI?—about his bombardment satellite.

The senator was apoplectic. He fized for minutes about abuse of the executive power; apparently Congress had been told as little about the bombardment satellite as an earlier Congress had been told about the atomic bomb. Well—ugh—what's done is done. Now the problem is to integrate the windfall into existing plans.

Mr. Gnome returned and said: "Miss Cardew will brief you, Mr. Justin. We have to be on our way now."

They left and Justin heard the Fish and Wildlife Survey panel truck move out of the driveway and down the road.

Back in the dining room Mrs. Norse was dozing in a corner.

"Well?" asked Betsy Cardew.

He turned down his collar and showed her the blade.

"The man said you were in and I was to brief you. What do you want to know about us?"

"What's there to know? How many. What you plan. Whether you think you can get away with it. Who's the boss?"

"I don't know how many there are. I don't really know whether there's anybody in it except a couple of local people and those three. They came around a month ago—I used to know the senator. I don't know who's in charge, if anybody."

"They told me it's a war plan, one of those things that lies in the files until it's needed. Well, it was needed when the collapse came at Edmonton. The orders were for as many atomic-service officers as possible to grab all the fissionable material they could lay their hands on and go underground. The same for psychological-warfare per-somed. Then start recruiting civilians into the organization."

"And what do we do?"

"They've mentioned a winter uprising. They hope by then to have a large part of the civilian population alerted. There should be food caches, caches of winter clothing, weapons and ammunition stolen from Red supply dumps. Then you wait for real socked-in, no-see flying weather and fire your suitcase A-bombs. Washington, of course, to behold the administration. Ports to prevent reinforcement. Tank parks. Roads and railways. Simultaneously a scorched-earth guerrilla war against the garrisons while they're cut off.

"Oh, and you asked me whether I think we can get away with it, didn't you? The answer is no. I don't think so. I don't see anything coming out of it except defeat and retaliation. But is there anything else to do?"

"No," he said gravely. Nor was there.

"What did you tell General Holkerith, anyway?" she asked. "Something to do with Gribble, wasn't it?"

"Sorry. They asked me not to say." He faltered for a change of subject. "How did you arrange the meeting, get in touch with them? If it's all right for me to know."

"I suppose so. Believe it or not, our conspiracy has a complete secret telegraphic network covering most of the United States. I didn't believe them when they told me, but it's true. Like finding out that you don't have to dig a tunnel under the English Channel, there's one already dug. The senator found out about the wires when he was on the crime commission. They call them dry wires. They're the old Postal Telegraph network from before your time and mine. Public clocks in all sorts of places used to beget correcting pulses over the wires. When Western Union absorbed Postal Telegraph they just blanked off their clock wires because radio had come along by then and any disk jockey could give you Naval Observatory time. I located one of the painted-over terminals in the Lackawanna station. Ticket clerk there's in with us. All you need to activate a link of the circuit is a battery, a key and a buzzer. He covers the wire for us. A brave man, Billy..."

"We're all heroes," he said bitterly. "Yes, I suppose we are. Would you like a drink?"

"I ought to start for home. Maybe I can hitch a ride."

"Nonsense. Stay the night and take the Keoka bus. If you stay for breakfast it'll improve your cover story. I think I told you—there's a lot of it going on."

"I think what you said was, 'It isn't love, but there's a lot of it going on.'"

"Something like that. There isn't much love around these days. A lot of loneliness, a lot of monotony, a lot of shattered pride."

"I'll take that drink, please," he said.

THEY walked together down Chitunga Hill toward the town, suvoring the still cool morning. The reservoir off to the north was a sheet of blue glass and the pumping station a toy fort in the clear air.

"I'm glad they never bombed us."

Betsy said, "I really like this place."

He thought of reminding her what a scorched-earth guerrilla campaign meant, but did not speak.

"Convoy," Betsy said, pointing down at the highway. The buglike trucks must be hauling supplies—but the tanks? "Manoeuvres," she said.

They walked on in silence, and Chunga Hill Road became Elm Street and they joined other morning walkers to work. A letter carrier in grey said: "Morning, Miss Cardew. What do you suppose those trucks are up to?"

He meant the convoy. Instead of bypassing the town they had turned off the highway and were rolling down High Street, three blocks farther on.

"Maybe they're going across the bridge to the Tunkhamock road, Mr. Selwin. Mr. Selwin, do you know Mr. Justin?"

"I don't believe I've had the pleasure," the old man said. "You a farmer, Mr. Justin?"

"Yes."

"You're a lucky man, then, I can tell you that. At least you get all you want to eat. Say, Mr. Justin, I hear that sometimes you people up in the hills have a few eggs or maybe a chicken or some butter left over and I happen to know a family with a little girl that's real sick with anaemia. Blood needs building up. Now if I could fix it up with you . . ."

Justin shook his head. "I can't get away with it, Mr. Selwin. I'm very sorry. And by the way, the farmers may be eating better than the city people, but they're sweating it, you know. Soon as you catch up it jumps again."

"He's telling the truth, Mr. Selwin," Betsy said. "Ask any of the rural carriers. Surely those trucks aren't stopping for our little traffic light, are they?"

"They never have before," Mr. Selwin said. They were now only a block from High Street. The postman peered over his glasses at the standing trucks. "But then," he said, "they don't seem to be regular Red Army trucks. Instead of the red star they have—let's see—MBA. What's MBA mean?"

"In the first place," Betsy said slowly, "it's MVD."

"Beats me, Miss Cardew. I don't know how you and the other young people do it." He winked at Justin privately.

"They're the border guards. And the political police," Betsy said.

Two trucks turned out of line on High Street and came roaring down their way along Elm. Justin got only a glimpse of young faces and special uniforms. Green, with polished leather.

They can't have come for us, thought Justin incredulously. There's a regiment of them. Fifty personnel-carrier trucks, command cars, half a dozen medium tanks. They can't have come for Betsy and me!

Walking in frozen silence they reached High Street. The main body of the convoy was parked there, the young men in their special uniforms impassive under the eyes and whispers of five hundred work-bound men and women. At the far end of High Street, the old bridge across the Sauguchanna, stood two of the tanks. The other four tanks were crawling northeast from

At each corner a sound truck announced: "All persons on the street will be shot"

High along Seneca. Nothing was in that direction except the high school—the 49th SMGU garrison.

A fat man in a high-shoulder command car got up, looked at his watch and blew a whistle three times. The convoy erupted into action. People laughed shrilly; it was comical to see almost one thousand young men who had been at school still a moment ago begin to climb out of their trucks, hand down equipment, consult maps and lists, snap salutes and pass low-toned commands and acknowledgments.

A pattern appeared. Justin knew it from Korea. There are only so many ways to occupy a town. This outfit was doing it the expensive, foolproof sledgehammer way. The strings of sixteen hardened men in double column were machine-gun sections streaming out to the perimeter of the area; they would set up a pair of cross-firing guns at each main road into the Center. The squads double-timing ahead of them would be pickets linking the machine-gun points. And there was a mortar section, sagging under its bedplates and barrels and canvas vests stuffed with bombs; they were on their way to the Susquehanna bridge embankment to reinforce the pair of tanks. A cheap little mortar bomb would sink a rowboat unworthy of a 155-millimetre shell from the tank; a white phosphorus bomb would be more effective against forbidden swimmers than machine-gun fire.

And the specialist squads moved down to the railroad station to hold all trains, and into the small A.T.&T. Building to take charge of communications, and into the Western Union office with its yellow-and-black hanging sign and varnished golden-oak counter and scared nineteen-year-old girl clerk.

And riflemen consulted maps and went and stood like traffic cops, a pair at every intersection, sweeping the crowded sidewalks with stony eyes.

Beside Justin Mr. Selwin gibbered: "It must be some kind of drill, don't you think? Just what you call a dry run, don't it look like?"

A vast relief was blossoming inside Justin. "I think so," he said. "I can't imagine what else it could be. Just practice in case." In case of me—but not yet.

A SOUND truck rolled down the street, stopping at each corner to make an announcement in Russian and one in English. They saw the crowds melt from the sidewalk and into shops as it approached; from three blocks away they caught the English: "All persons off the streets at once and await inspections. Persons on the street in three minutes will be shot—"

They dived for a store the instant it sank in. The store happened to be Mr. Farish's pharmacy. "Thank God," said Betsy. "A place with coffee." Her voice shook.

The sound truck stopped only a couple of yards away at the intersection and bellowed in Russian and English. The score or so of people crowded into the store debated on the Russian announcement. They more or less agreed at last that the announcement had been orders for all SMGU troops to report at once to the high-school athletic field.

Bald young Mr. Farish was behind his soda fountain making and serving coffee mechanically. When he got to Justin, Betsy and Mr. Selwin he twinkled: "Little break in the monotony, eh?"

Mr. Selwin said: "I ought to be in the sorting room. I've been late before this year, no fault of my own. It's going to look awfully bad."

The coffee was some terrible synthetic or other.

Betsy said from the window: "They're arresting the SMGU men—I think." Everybody crowded up to see a couple of regular-detachment people being marched along by MVD troops. The green-uniformed young men had taken the regulars' tommy guns.

"It's something like a visit from the Inspector General," said a man who actually took a short step through the door onto the sidewalk to see better. "Only—Russian." One of the MVD men posted like traffic cops yelled at him and brandished his rifle. He grinned and ducked back into the store.

"Russians don't scare me any more," he announced. "You know what I mean. I thought it was the end of the world."

when they came, but I learned. They're GIs, and so what?"

A woman looked around, scowled and said: "Speak for yourself."

It precipitated a ten-minute debate in the crowded little store. Chianga Center had not yet decided on the relationship between itself and the Russians. We might be across the Mississippi, said somebody. How'd you like to have a bunch of Chinks swaggering around? Yeah, the Russians aren't so different from Americans. It says in the Times they both have characters shaped by frontiers—A Toynebean's view was that the occupiers would be softened and democratized by their contact with the occupied.

Through it all Justin and Betsy stood in a rear corner; their hands nervously entwined. Mr. Selwin left them long enough for a worried glance through the window. While the old man was gone Justin had time to mutter: "Have you got a blade? I could buy one for you."

"I have one," she said, barely moving her lips.

Mr. Selwin came back. "I believe it's all over," he said. The streets are clear and those soldiers are just standing there and I ought to get to the sorting room."

"Better not, Mr. Selwin," Betsy said. "You don't understand, Miss Cardew. You just took a mad job because you had to work at something. I've got thirty-two years in and absence don't look good when a man's my age. They start to say you're slipping. Young people don't understand that. I believe I'm going to ask that soldier standing down there if I can go now."

"I wouldn't, Mr. Selwin," Justin told him.

Selwin went anyway. He shouted from the doorway at the pair of riflemen: "Is it all right now? We go? Free?" They stared at him.

Some of the other Americans stranded in the store called out hopefully in Russian. The faces of the young men in green didn't change. "Better not," a man told Mr. Selwin.

Mr. Selwin said: "I'll try a few steps out. It all seems to be over anyway."
He stepped out tentatively, keeping his eye on the Russians. They simply watched incuriously. The postman turned and grinned for a moment at the people in the store and took a couple of cautious steps down the street, then a couple more.

One of the Russians raised his rifle and shot Mr. Selwin in the chest. The big bullet blasted a grunt out of the old man, but after he fell he was silent. Apparently the sentry had been waiting for Mr. Selwin to step past the glass window of the drugstore to kick wall that would provide a backstop.

The man who wasn't scared any more said slowly: "I think this is a different kind of Russian we have here."

A middle-aged woman began to shake and sob with hysteria. Mr. Farish yelled: "Don't let her knock those bottles over, please! I'll get some ammonia spirits—"

He fed them to her from a glass, nervously stroking his bald head. She calmed down, took the glass in her own hands and gulped it, coughing.

They heard the boom of the sound truck in the distance again, and another sound: machine guns, a pair of them firing short carefully spaced bursts. "It isn't combat firing," Justin said in bewilderment. "It sounds as if they're shooting for badges on a range."

Then a splintering of rifle shots confused the sound and then the track rolled down High Street and drowed out the small arms with its yammer.

"All persons registered with the 449th Soviet Military Government Unit are ordered to report at once to the athletic field. Stragglers will be fired on. All persons registered—"

AFTER THE case of Mr. Selwin they did not hesitate. The shops along High Street cringed civilians who streamed towards the field, some of them running.

The field was clear on the other side of town from High Street. The congestion as they neared it was worse than it had ever been for a Saturday football game, even the traditional rivalry of Chiung Catamounts versus Kooka Cougars. The bellowing sound track dimmed behind them. The quaver and prissy bursts-of-four machine gunning became louder, with the occasional spatter of rifles still occurring now and then.

Green-uniformed MVD men were posted around the field, gesturing the crowd through. One man was going the wrong way; he charged out of the gate beneath the stands, stumbling and carrying off the incoming civilians. Justin dodged and yanked Betsy aside as the man leaned over and was sick. Then the crowd swept them on through the narrow gate. They popped out inside on the cinder track that circled the field; MVD men gestured there along. The small bleachers across the field from them and the small stands sloping back behind them were full; these late arrivals were to be stranded.

The field itself was crowded with something Justin at first—idiotically—took to be a dress parade. As he and Betsy shuffled sideways along the cinder track under the pressure of more arrivals his eye gradually sorted out the two thousand-odd soldiers on the field.

First there were the disarmed men of the 449th rigidly at attention behind their officers. They were drawn up in a solid block of companies that stretched from the north goal line to the thirty-yard line. Everybody was there, down to the medics in their hospital coats and the cooks and bakers in their whites.

Then he saw the tanks, one at each corner of the field, their machine guns and cannon depressed to fire point blank into the 449th. Then he saw the green-uniformed MVD men with rifles and tommy guns and a pile of now dead directly before them on the fifty-yard line.

Machine guns roared above his head. Betsy screamed and clapped her hands to her head. The muzzle blast was terrific.

He turned and saw where they were coming from. A pair of them were mounted in the little press box hung from the roof of the stands, the box where the Valley News used to cover the games and WVC-TV used to broadcast the traditional rivalry each year. The guns hammered with that fring-range artificiality for a while and then stopped. Justin noticed that directly in front of them in midfield five soldiers of the 449th lay butchered.

Somebody in the field bawled: "Rop-tah-gev!"

MVD men began to hustle officers and men from one of the company blocks. All the officers, one enlisted man in four. The uneven rifle shot was explained while the selection was going on. One of the enlisted men broke loose and ran, screaming, when a green-uniformed youth tapped his chest. He was shot down as he sprinted sweatily towards the bleachers. The rest moved like zombies to the killing ground. In a few seconds they too were sprawling and screaming while the plunging fire from the press box hacked up the carefully tended sod of the stadium.

THE WORD was traveling from early arrivals in the stands to those who had come late and were jammed onto the track. "They made a big speech in Russian and English first," a man next to Justin reported, after whispers with his neighbor. He spoke to Justin, but he couldn't take his eyes off the charnel heap in the infield. His face and voice were just a little insane. "Fella says they called the 449th traitors to international socialism. Stuff about sloth, negligence, corruption, disgrace to the army. Then they shot all the top brass starting with Platoff. Say did you hear about Platoff and Mrs. —?"

"I heard," Justin said. He turned away.

"Rubish guy," Betsy whispered. "Company G. That's only the fourth in their alphabet. They'll be busy all morning."

They were.

At noon the last of the job was done. The weeping, or blank-faced, or madly grinning survivors of the 449th were loaded onto trucks and the field PA system cleared its throat.

"Proclamation. To the indigenous population of the area formerly under control of the 449th Soviet Military Government Unit. You are ordered to inform all persons unable to attend the foregoing demonstration of what has happened. You are advised that this is the treatment that will be accorded to all such betrayers of international socialist morality as the late Platoff and his gang of bourgeois-spirited lackeys. You are advised that henceforth this area will be under the direction of the Ministryyevskikh Vnoshennikh Deyel, the Ministry of Internal Affairs. You are advised that all laws and rules of the Occupation will be rigidly enforced from this moment on. You are ordered to disperse within ten minutes. Troops will fire on stragglers."

This might have been intended to precipitate a panic and an excuse for slaughter. It did not. Justin, sated with the horror of the morning's work, still had some room for pride in him when the people in stands and bleachers rose and slowly filed from the stadium, turned their backs on the green-uniformed young monsters and their pile of carion without cringing.

Justin walked with Betsy to the post office and left her there with a silent squeeze of the hand.

At the restaurant that doubled as bus station an old woman told him: "No buses been along all morning, mister. Should of been the Koska bus at eight, ten and twelve. And this fella in the green with the fancy belt, he walked in and he ripped down the bus schedule right off the wall. I guess he didn't speak English, but then I guess he didn't have to, did he?"

"I guess not," Justin said.

He went out and started the fifteen-mile walk home under the heading midsummer sun.

NEXT ISSUE: PART TWO

THE SURVIVAL of freedom in the world lies in the weakened hands of two ordinary men. Can they pierce the conquering Russians' roadblocks and get their vital news to the leaders of the Underground?

EDITORIAL

WANTED: a Salk approach to old people's problems

WHETHER or not the successful testing of the Salk polio vaccine was the most important medical news of the century, it was easily the most exciting. We doubt that even the inevitable cure for cancer, which threatens the whole population, will cause as much rejoicing as did the near-preventive for polio, which threatens less than a fifth of the population in any substantial degree. This is right and natural; a healthy child is still the loveliest sight on earth and a sick child is the most tragic.

But the joy that greeted this great victory on behalf of our young people threw into sharp relief a different kind of attitude: the resignation with which we accept the defeats of our old people.

We use the word resignation, not the word apathy. In statistical and material terms Western society—and Canada especially—cannot be accused of being callous or indifferent toward the growing needs of its older citizens. This country alone is spending hundreds of millions of dollars a year on state pensions for the aged. Most large firms and many small ones contribute generously to separate retirement funds for their employees. For those who through sickness or other causes still cannot take care of themselves in their later years, charity is available, and almost always on terms that need deprive the recipient of none of his dignity or self-respect.

But in spite of this everyone knows that being old without substantial private resources is almost sure to be a bleak and unhappy experience. Everyone regrets this. No one is apathetic about it—for most of us are going to be old sooner or later ourselves. But most of us are resigned to it; we've thrown up our hands and said, in effect: "We'd like to do better, but how much better can we do without either wrecking our whole economy or slowing it to a walk?"

In this magazine's opinion there is one new thing we could do and soon must do to help the aged. We could bring to bear on their problems the same human genius, the same dogged perseverance, the same patience and devotion, the same fine sense of adventure and discovery that gave the world a vaccine for polio. We could probably do this without spending a single extra dollar and in the long run we might even save some dollars.

The Salk vaccine was not the product of one man's inspired impulse. Equate it with the long history of medical research and it was the product of a million men and women, working in a thousand directions for a hundred years. Even in the final phases Dr. Salk and his immediate associates spent years trying hundreds of experiments they were almost certain would not work until at last they found the complicated, winding chain of experiments that did work.

If social research could even begin to match the imagination and determination of medical research, it might very well begin to meet, rather than merely to sidestep, such mighty challenges as we have been discussing here.

How much real original thought has been given in the last fifty years to the vexed question of the means test versus the universal pension? Almost none. We threw out the means test because it was "degrading." The "solution" is to give forty dollars a month to all old people whether they need it or not; as a result those who really need the pension don't get enough. Pension administrators have been insisting for generations that there is no other alternative.

How much original thought has been given to the problem of the healthy, active wage-earner who is required to retire at sixty-five? How much original thought to the wage-earner who could work part-time, with profit to himself, his employer and the national economy, for many years after he is unable to work full-time?

How much thought to that tragic figure, the unemployed man of fifty-five or sixty who can't find a job at any price because he has become a mere actuarial statistic in the brave new world of group insurance and company retirement plans?

We don't profess to have any of these solutions. But we cannot believe the race that learned how to prevent the physical crippling of its young is incapable of preventing the economic and social crippling of its old. It's time we put our brains to work on the job our best brains, our freshest brains and our most stubborn brains.

Ralph Allen Editor
 Pierre Berton Managing Editor
 Leslie F. Mannan Associate Editor
 Blair Fraser Ottawa Editor
 Art Director: Gene Alliman, Assistant: Desmond English
 Assistant Editors: Fred Bodsworth, N. O. Bonifant, Robert Collins, Jake Gray, Sidney Katz, Keith A. Knowlton, David MacDonald, Herbert Manning, McKenzie Porter, Ian Scandlers, Janice Tyrwhitt.
 Editorial Assistants: Joan Darty, Lois Morrison, Carol Lindsay, Joan Weatherhead.

Douglas M. Gowdy Manager
 Hal Linton Advertising Manager
 S. Wes Spicer Advertising Production Manager
 E. Douglas Myles Circulation Manager

Editorial, Circulation & Advertising Offices:
 481 University Avenue, Toronto 2, Canada

CONTENTS

Vol. 68 MAY 28, 1955 No. 11

Cover Painting by Rex Woods

Articles

THE GRAVE INEQUALITIES IN OUR SEPARATE SCHOOLS. Blair Fraser	9
WHY U. S. TOURISTS ARE PASSING UP CANADA. Robert Thomas. Allan	12
THE HON. PORTER OF THE PARLOR CAR. Norman Creighton	16
THE MORGUE THAT SAILED FROM SPRINGBANK. A Maclean's Flashback. Stanley Fillmore	18
HOW THE TAYLORS THWART THE SAFE-CRACKERS. Frank Coft	20
THE STRUGGLE FOR THE BORDER. Conclusion. THEY SAVED THE PACIFIC COAST FOR CANADA. Bruce McMillan	22

Fiction

NOT THIS AUGUST. Part Two. C. M. Kamblich	14
---	----

Departments

EDITORIAL	2
LONDON LETTER. Beverly Baxter	4
BACKSTAGE AT OTTAWA. Blair Fraser	4
MACLEAN'S MOVIES. Rated by Clyde Gilmore	24
JASPER. Cartoon by Simpkins	70
MAILBAG	72

PHOTOGRAPHS IN THIS ISSUE

By—Milton Services (4), Basil Zavan (9, 10, 11), Walter Currier (16, 17, 20), Carl Hodgins (19), Pringle and Booth (21).

NOT THIS AUGUST

With all the world enslaved after this war of the future, the tortured Justin and the saintly Sparhawk struggled to reach the Underground with the secret that might still win back freedom

BY C. M. KORNBLUTH

"ANYONE ON THIS STREET in three minutes will be shot," the voice from the Russian sound truck commanded. Billy Justin and Betty Cardew dived for cover while a Russian bullet felled a less cautious spectator.

With the arrival of MVD troops, the occupation of Chiung Center, N.Y., entered its most severe phase since the capitulation of the West on April 17, 1965—that terrible day when the United States, the last nation to hold out against the combined forces of Russia and Communist China, had surrendered at Edmonton.

Chiung citizens like Farish, the timid druggist, and Gus Feinblatt, the fatalistic Jewish farmer, dreaded the new Red regime. Even collaborationist storekeeper Croley was uneasy. Only Mr. Sparhawk, an eccentric itinerant preacher, seemed to find consolation in his own doctrines of asceticism and non-resistance.

Billy Justin, thirty-seven-year-old commercial artist turned dairy farmer, had extra reason for evading the hail of Russian bullets. He knew that the West's last hope would die with him if he were killed.

At first Justin had resisted the fact that pretty Betty Cardew and General Hollerith, the legless veteran who posed as a hobo, had implicated him in the early stages of a resistance movement. But he knew he was irrevocably committed to their side when Gribble, an ex-Pentagon general whose nerve had cracked when he was forced to order the extinction of five thousand of his own scientists for security reasons, entrusted to him the secret that represented democracy's last desperate chance of retaliation. Hidden in an underground factory was the most powerful weapon ever devised by man, a satellite capable of encircling the earth and annihilating city after city with hydrogen bombs.

"I carried out the first half, Justin. You'll help me, won't you," Gribble pleaded. "You and I are the only people in the world who know that the satellite exists. It's up to you to smuggle the secret into the hands of the resistance leaders—and to see that they use it."

TWO

JUSTIN was scything down the dry grass of autumn for winter feeding to the cows. Behind him Gribble followed with a rake and a hoarded ball of twine ends, making bundles they could carry to the barn.

It was October.

In the monotony of scything, the hypnotic step—swing—slice—step—swing—slice, Justin could almost believe in the role he was playing. Of all the roles he had played, it was the queerest.

Successively he had impersonated a growup, a soldier, a businessman-artist, a Farm Front Fighter. Now what he had to tell himself was: "You're a peasant. This is what it's like to be a peasant."

And he was. Dirty, coarsened, tired and underfed, Justin who had supposed himself a democrat all his life found himself at last a member of the eternal overwhelming majority, brother at last in space and time to the stone-age grubbers of roots, the Chinese toiling with an aching back and thighs over rice shoots in the dynasty of Han or Comrade Mao, potato-eaters of the Andes or the Netherlands, all those who in time past, time present and perhaps for all time to come must dig in stubborn ground while the knees shake with fatigue. The emblems of the brotherhood were hunger and fatigue.

Three months under the Mecenesyvertoå Vnoctrih Dyehi had left him a clear choice. He could be a debased animal or he could die.

He knew of people by the dozen who had chosen to be people. They had died. This was the case of the Wehrweins, of Straw Hill. The Wehrweins refused to understand that things were different now. They refused to make their quota, trusting to the farmer's old technique of the blank stare, the "Who me mister?" and the sullen "Tain't no business of mine." A polite search would have shown them nothing, but the MVD searched with crowbars and found a hoard of grain.

The Wehrweins were shot for sabotage. Their children were shot for failing to report their sabotage.

The Elekinmns, of Little Finland, one of those big close-knit European family complexes, were wiped out to the last man, woman and child. Papa Gunder, their patriarch, cursed and struck an MVD Agro Section inspector: unlawful violence against the occupying authority.

Sokoloff wheeled and roared; the light glared. How long could Justin bear the cruel Conveyor?

Mr. Konreid made no more popskull brandy from his sprawling, slovenly vineyard. Mr. Konreid had been shot for failure to obey agricultural crop-acreage regulations. His fifty-year-old son and the son's fifty-year-old wife, workers in the feed mill, town dwellers who had not seen the old man since a bitter estrangement three decades ago, died with him in the centre of the athletic field: failure to report contravention of agricultural regulation.

There was a new whispered phrase: "shipped south." Mr. and Mrs. Lacey, of Four Corners, had been "shipped south." They were back in two weeks, arriving up from questions, seemingly half insane. All their teeth had been pulled and they worked their fields with lunatic zeal. The four nearest neighbors of the Laceys were arrested soon afterward by MVD teams who knew exactly where to find their hoards of grain, the eggs laid down in water glass, the secret smokehouse in the wood where hams and bacon slowly turned on strings over smoldering hickory chips. The neighbors were shot.

There were never audible complaints any more, through two milk-norm increases and two ration reductions. Everybody had taken to frantic weeding in every spare second; leisure did not exist. The smallest children were pressed into work. A three-year-old who carelessly tore out a turnip top instead of parasitic wild mustard was beaten and did not eat that night. Possibly a generation of permissive-discipline pediatricians were whirling in their graves, but the pediatricians had not expected that American parents, comfortable in mortgaged homes, secure in union contracts, nourished at glittering supermarkets, neat in their twelve-ninety-eight dresses and forty-dollar suits would soon rejoin the eternal majority of hunger and fatigue.

Even the great American bathroom was a mockery. Nobody talked about it but everybody was squeezing the utmost from his land by manuring with human excrement, an Oriental practice from which the fortunate North Americans had been excused by virtue of the Haber process, Peruvian guano and Mexican phosphate rock. But there was no fertilizer compounded of nitrate, guano and phosphorus to be had at Croley's store these days. Presumably it was being shipped direct to Russia and China.

Justin, shorter, darker and dirtier than he had been two short months ago, stooped and swung his scythe. Gribble absolutely couldn't get the hang of it, not after days of

Continued on page 43

The resistance leaders gasped at the sores on Justin's back. "And they drilled my teeth for six hours," he told them.

ILLUSTRATED BY DON ANDERSON

Not This August

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 14

hand-historing practice. The coordination wasn't there. The little man and his shattered nervous system were good for nothing but gleaming with a sickle behind Justin, raking and banding.

Had there once been one-man bakers? Had there really? Had one man, proudly astride a snorting red tractor, chugged down a field, importantly leaning far out and peering behind him as the scoop swept up mowed windrows, the plunging tamper arm compacted the hay, the binder twirled curd around and tied, and the machine bumpingly ejected bale after perfect bale?

Justin now was a citizen of the North American People's Democratic Republic, at last in formal existence months after its currency had gone into circulation. Everybody had been ordered to report to the Center for ceremonies and a spontaneous demonstration. Betsy Cardew was prominent in the demonstration. She had joined the Party of the People and worked at it with shrill fanaticism. Condescendingly mentioned in one speech as a tireless worker for the cause of peace and democracy, she looked, when Justin met her occasionally at the mailbox, very tired indeed. She sometimes pussed him a note, because now there was a tape recorder behind the dashboard of her car.

When one of the notes said something like "Still heard nothing. Must be picked up. Prisms used blades in time since we're still at large. Billy, Billy, how I wish . . . wht's use" he would start to recall that he belonged to a conspiracy of the oppressed, that he was the trigger man of the bombardment satellite. And that one step outside the narrow lines would mean his death.

It was easier to go on mowing than to stop and let his muscles knot up in the first cutting winds from the north. They had to get in the hay. They had to fell trees in the wood lot and buck them up with a Swedish saw and split them for the stove. Dry autumn was going to be followed by cold winter. There would be no coal; coal was for Russia and China these days.

The North American People's Democratic Republic was born, puppet of Asia, and the United States of America—obstinately the consciousness of it would not die—was a puppet's slave. Changs County produced a "surplus" of food, while its inhabitants were verging on starvation, that went to New York for shipment to Russia in a steady flow with shipments from thousands of other rural counties.

But whispered tales said the factory cities were worse! It was easy to imagine how, once self-pity admitted the possibility, Barracks. Two twelve-hour shifts. Starvation rations at a patrolled mess hall. A beltline whose speed could be pushed up imperceptibly until you dropped at your job—and were flogged or shot for dropping. And whispered tales said the young men and women of the North American armies were toiling half at reclamation projects in the Soviet Arctic, the rest in the arid Chinese interior.

Of course they would never come back.

Even to the peasant that Billy Justin had turned into the brutal audacity of the over-all plan was slowly becoming clear. It was attrition of the U. S. population. The oldsters were to die off gradually of scanty food and pneumonia—the coming winter without coal would sweep like his scythe through the population. The youngsters who would normally make up the loss were safely in the Arctic and the Gobi.

Within a couple of years more Russians and Chinese would begin to arrive—colonists this time instead of soldiers.

The senator, the psychologist and the FBI man were dust by now.

The Postal Telegraph "dry wire," still guarded at fantastic risk by the ticket seller in the railroad station, was silent and had been for two months.

Rawson—but he was a general named Hollerith, wasn't he?—could only say he knew nothing, he had heard nothing, they must wait.

Betsy Cardew was dying by inches of fatigue and strain, impersonating a fanatical convert, waiting for the hand on her shoulder, praying there would be time for her first to open her carotid artery.

There was nothing he could do. There was absolutely nothing he could do. All he could do was scythe down the dry grass, stop every dozen paces and sweep the whetstone twice along the worn steel blade. It was important to keep the blade keen; a dull scythe crushed down the grass instead of slicing it. Grass crushed to the ground was wasted and he would need every blade of it to see the small herd through the winter.

He woke from his daze to find himself at the end of the field of redtop. Beyond was the stubble of his cornland, which had been reaped for silage a month ago. He looked around and saw Gribble far behind him, doggedly raking. And behind Gribble an approaching figure, tall and gaunt as a scarecrow.

"Hello there, William," called Mr. Sparhawk. "I've come for a bit of dinner and a pallet for the night. Don't mind, old boy, do you?"

II

IT WAS the hour after dinner. These days that meant the hour when quarrels flared between Justin and the feeble whining Gribble. There was something about a meal utterly without pleasure that your temper couldn't take. No coffee, not even synthetic, no pepper or spices, no dessert, no meat. They dined on baked mashed potatoes, with an unsuccessful experiment at cheese making sprinkled over the top. Boiled greens on the side. They lay like stones in the stomach.

It was the hour for Justin to curse Gribble for his laziness and Gribble to cover and complain.

Mr. Sparhawk was there that night, however. He had said a heathen grace, eaten sparingly of the potatoes—apologetically scraping off the unsuccessful cheese topping—and finally excused himself to sit on the floor cross-legged. He looked about the same as ever. His rucksack was worn, he had a new peed branch for a staff and he wore jeans instead of Red Army pants and shirt. He talked less than usual, perhaps judging that Justin would welcome an excuse to throw him out.

Justin studied the old man morosely. There was something awfully peculiar about his presence, something

"He was the satellite's trigger man . . .
One wrong step could mean his death"

he couldn't put his finger on.
"Where've you been lately?" he asked.

"South to Maryland. North to Vermont. Where the Ground that is the Overseas bade me . . ."

"I didn't ask you that, damn you!" Mr. Sparhawk shrugged apologetically, but he couldn't resist preaching. "I forgive your curse," he said. "I know that in your present incarnation you're still earth- and appetite-bound . . ."

"Maryland and Vermont," Justin slowly ruminated. "How?"
Mr. Sparhawk looked politely baffled. "I'm sorry, William," he said. "Your question conveys nothing to me."

"I mean how? How do you travel? How do you get through the check points? Why aren't you picked up?"

"Oh," Mr. Sparhawk said, surprised. "But I am. Often."

"And what happens?"
Modesty and pride struggled visibly on the old man's face. At last he said: "When it's a case of the other ranks—privates and noncoms, you'd say—I reluctantly put on an outworn garment . . ." He stood to attention and his mild face hardened. The jaw thrust out and the very nose seemed to turn into a predator's beak. "Damn you," Sparhawk rasped, "what's the meaning of this? How dare you obstruct a loyal citizen and a minister of the gospel? By God, you popinjays stand aside or your superiors shall hear of it and so much the worse for you!"

The windowpanes rattled. Justin and Gribble quailed before his rancorous, righteous anger and authority. Mr. Sparhawk smiled apologetically and folded into a cross-legged squat again. "It usually works," he said mildly. "When it doesn't, I'm brought in for questioning. Officers tend to bring one in no matter what one does, so when confronted with a commission I spare myself the necessity of reverting to my evil old ways."

"Once I'm in the local choksy I politely but firmly invoke the North American People's Democratic Republic guarantee of freedom of worship, and quite a good guarantee it is too. My particular way of worship, I explain politely, is to wander and preach. To make a long story short, William, I'm usually released after a couple of days, though once I was held as long as a week. Our custodians take the stand that I'm free to wander and preach as long as I wander and preach outside their particular jurisdiction. They escort me to the border, quite often kick me in the seat, and tell me not to come back."

Justin moistened his lips. "Haven't you ever been on the—Conveyor?"

"Conveyor, William? Oh, yes. You mean that strange new sacrament of theirs."

Sacrament? Well, that was one thing you could call it with its element of penance and confession. Another was sadistic lunacy, systematic starvation, drugging and torture designed to exact a meaningless confession which everybody knew was worthless. Perhaps it was a dark sacrament after all, intelligible only to faith.

Mr. Sparhawk was saying: "Yes, I've been on the Conveyor. But what did I have to confess? They gave up after three days."

"They won't give up in MVD territory," Justin said grimly. "You were a fool to move in here. Did you think they were gone by now?"

"My dear fellow, of course I didn't. It was a Test."

A TEST. Justin went silently to the corner and pried up a floor board. Under it was the last of the Konrad brandy, a pint in a former cleaning-fluid bottle. A Test, he thought. A Test of manhood, patriotism, sanity . . .
"Do you drink?" he asked Mr. Sparhawk.

"Only natural wine," the old man apologized. "It is a clear contravention of the intended mission of alcohol to drink fortified wines or distilled liquors. But please don't let my presence stop you from indulging."

"I won't," Justin said flatly. He knew Gribble's eyes were on the bottle in his hand, hungrily hoping. He poured a glassful for the little man and shoved it at him. He himself drank from the bottle, carefully, and put it in his pocket. The new liquor cut like a file and he felt the dizziness of intoxication almost at once. Careful, he said sharply to himself. Get brave if you have to but don't become a drunken fool. He asked Mr. Sparhawk: "What do you mean by Test?"

"Why, William, a Test is a Test. A trial, an assay—I don't really know how to answer. But every once in a while one must prove that he isn't relapsing into sloth and merely mumbling words. One must do something deliberately and knowing it will be difficult, dangerous, disagreeable. Surely you understand. That's why I entered territory under the direction of the Ministry of Internal Affairs. It's quite a good Test, too. Not nasty, like Saint What's-her-name swallowing tubercular sputum. When people do that sort of thing there's always the possibility that some confounded Freudian is going to call them lunatics. Oh, a good Test is hard to find, William! I flatter myself that I've found one in our green-clothed friends' rigorous enforcement of the occupation statutes . . ."

While the old man rambled on it suddenly became crystal-clear to Justin that he had all along been able to re-establish communications with the bomb plot.

All he had to do now, all he'd needed to do all along was walk out and do it.

First try walking to Washington, Pennsylvania, to find the Bee-Jay salesman.

If that failed, as it might, he should walk to the senator's home town in Michigan and enquire around.

If that didn't work, he should walk to Washington, D.C., and find out what was going on in the Fish and Wildlife Survey.

If none of these worked he would have to try some of the more tenuous ones.

There were certain objections to the scheme, he realized. One was that he'd probably be arrested before he got a mile beyond Norton, New York. This would probably lead to his torture, confession and execution unless he used his razor blade in time. But he smiled incredulously at himself for once having thought that this objection overruled the need to walk out and re-establish contact so that the satellite could be sent up.

If Mr. Sparhawk could take the beatings and the uncertainty in exchange for his urge to wander and mench, what shouldn't he be able to accept and risk with nothing less at stake than the nation?

It was as simple as that. If you have to walk out and do it, the way to do it is to walk out and do it.

And the first thing to do was disobey his first command: not to be taken alive.

MR. SPARHAWK," he said abruptly. "Your time on the Conveyor is there anything you did so you kept from breaking down? Have you got sedatives or anything like that?"

The old man said: "I must confess I used yoga—abused it, rather, for to use it is to abuse it. Yoga is of course a set of philosophical systems intended to put one beyond identity and desire, but the Conveyor is peculiarly persuasive that one has an identity and desires to retain it." He chuckled complacently. "Asana postures are effective while confined in a cell waiting. It is part of their scheme to break one down by waiting. The soul which does not seek release from the Wheel is prey to terrors and fancies during such an interlude. However, I would assume the siddhasana, thus . . ." Mr. Sparhawk squirmed into a Buddha-like posture which outraged Justin's training as an artist in that it went far beyond the bounds of what his anatomy textbooks regarded as possible to a human being.

"And I would vary it with the padmasana, thus . . ." Mr. Sparhawk squirmed again, and this time settled down into a position which looked possible but exquisitely uncomfortable. "The postures," said Mr. Sparhawk, "have carried me through a bit of solitary confinement. They are dark cells, you know, and that's the sort of thing that drives most chaps absolutely crackers. And there's pranayama, of course." He seemed to have finished.

"Pranayama?" Justin urged gently. "Oh, you don't know about it, do you?" asked the old man disapprovingly. "It's the yoga of breathing, and quite important. I used it when they were beating me a bit. You see, one breathes in through the left nostril seven and a half seconds and holds it for thirty and a half seconds. One then exhales through the right nostril in fifteen and a half seconds, then inhales through the same nostril for the same period, then one . . ."

"And this—helped?"
"How could it fail to, William? During pranayama one is sometimes so freed of distractions that one floats about the room, though I admit I've not done that yet or seen it. Surely a truncheon against the shins could be only a minor nuisance to one deeply engaged in pranayama, don't you think?"

"As long as it works."

Sparhawk sighed regretfully: "William, old man, I can see you're struggling with it as a difficult idea. If only you were a bit along in Zen how simple it would be! I'd merely kick you in the bum by surprise or unexpectedly shout 'Fiddle-dee-dee!' in your ear and it would all come to you. What a mess you've made of your life, William. No Zen at all. The time you've wasted!"

Justin clenched his fists and said: "I'm not going to waste any more time, Mr. Sparhawk. Take me with you."

The old man asked coldly, suddenly alert: "Is this what you call a rib, William?"

"I'm perfectly sincere. I want to go with you. To Washington, Pennsylvania."

"My dear boy, it doesn't matter where one goes. But I'm afraid a vestigial attachment to worldly vanities keeps me from enjoying this joke of yours. If you'll excuse me, I must say my prayers and turn in."

"He means it!" Gribble suddenly squalled, terrified. "Don't leave me, Justin, don't leave me alone here, they'll beat me up to find out where you went and they'll shoot me in the cellar . . ."

"Work it out for yourself, Gribble," Justin said gently. "I'm going. I've got to. Tell them any lies you like and if they don't work, die like a man. Before you left the truth."

Sparhawk rose from his padmasana posture, excitement in his eyes. "You

Who said there were no new continents? Soon America would be free of people do mean it, William?" he asked tremulously. "This isn't a joke?"

Justin said: "I'm not joking. Not about risking my life. I want to go with you."

And, he said to himself, by this token you cease to be a peasant, an animal. It's important that you set out on your military mission, of course. But it's more important that you set out on any mission at all and by that token become once more a man.

"Mr. Sparhawk," he said diffidently. The old man was silently praying, but turned to smile beneficently at him. "Mr. Sparhawk, I know you make a point of early departure, but could we stay here until mail time tomorrow? I want to say goodbye."

"I understand," the old man beamed at his convert. "I think we can permit it."

Good-by, Rebel Cardiac. What might have been will never be.

III

THEY had been five days on the road and covered twenty miles as the cross files, eighty on the back roads chosen from an old Texaco map, when they met their first Reds.

Sparhawk was drilling Justin when it happened; they were in a quiet clearing outside Leesport, Pennsylvania, which the old man thought suitable for contemplation.

Justin under his direction contorted himself into the joint-wrenching padmasana and was trying not to sneaker at the order that followed. It was to look at the space between his eyebrows and meditate upon the syllable "Om." The soldiers, a ten-man squad, came out of the woods at that point.

The soldiers looked at them and roared with laughter. Their sergeant and Mr. Sparhawk were able to converse after a fashion in mixed English and Russian. Justin did not succeed in looking at the space between his eyebrows or in meditating upon the syllable "Om." Locked in the padmasana, he watched the parley between the two men and meditated on the Conveyor. From time to time one of the soldiers would poke him curiously and grin: "Golovostimulirov."

The parley ended; the soldiers left. The tremendous fact was that they had been intercepted, had been unable to show documents justifying their presence, and yet had not been arrested.

"How did you do it, Mr. Sparhawk?" he gasped.

"Saigombo." Mr. Sparhawk said absently. "Soul force. It works, you know. Most of the time, that is. Their tendency is to assume that one's probably all right and that anyway it's no business of theirs. Marked contrast with the MVDs, whose assumption is that one probably isn't all right and that everything's business of theirs. But let's not chatter, William. You're supposed to be in the padmasana. Supposed to be, I say with reason. What is the padmasana? It is the right foot on the left thigh, the left foot on the right thigh, holding the right great toe with the right hand, the left great toe with the left hand, the hands coming from behind the back and crossing, the chin resting on the interclavicular space, the sight fixed on the space between the eyebrows—falling flat, the tip of the nose. In one respect you succeed, William; you have managed to look at the tip of your nose. You must try harder . . ."

Justin, his eyes aching from being crossed on his nose, his neck aching, his thighs and arms and back aching, tried harder. Mr. Sparhawk slid easily into the posture and went on: "When the command of padmasana has been attained you will find there is no longer suffering from cold, heat, hunger, thirst, fatigue or similar afflictions."

It was nice that the old man believed it all, Justin thought as he ached. His belief, even expressed in pidgin Russian, shone transcendently through the words and had got the pair of them tacitly certified as harmless fanatics.

THEIR second week on the road, trending generally southwest into the Allegheny Valley, found them one night approaching a rundown farmhouse. There was no light to be seen. A starving mongrel dog snarped at them when they climbed to the littered, unwept porch. Justin drove him off with a stick while Mr. Sparhawk rapped politely on the door. There was no answer. Mr. Sparhawk rapped again and the unlatched door swung open creaking. By moonlight through a window they saw an old man sprawled on the floor.

Mr. Sparhawk took over with crisp efficiency. Pulse, skin and a hoarse rattle in the chest told him, he said, that the man was suffering from pneumonia and starvation. They brought the cot from his bedroom into the kitchen and built a roaring fire in the stove. They made gruel and spooned some down the sick man's throat and for a couple of hours while they watched he seemed to rally. He died at midnight, though, and they buried him in the morning in his dooryard. Justin had to keep driving all the day and was careful to put a layer of heavy stones on the grave.

The weather was hardly brisk yet—at least to men who had been through the war years on scarce fuel rations. The old man may have been ready to go from the first bug that got into his system. But it was a foretaste of the coming winter, which would do the Reds' work thoroughly and well. It would kill Americans by the million, and would leave open to settlement new acres by the million.

Who said there were no continents left to discover? A dozen winters would come and go, and finally the Russians would come and find a land almost as bare of humanity as Columbus had.

While Mr. Sparhawk whispered a meditation of St. John of the Cross by the graveside Justin methodically searched the farmhouse and struck gold. A hard lump in the old man's pillow turned out to be a tin box crammed with sewing needles, thread, razor blades and a can of black pepper. He distributed the treasures among his pockets and returned to the grave, where he joined in the meditation.

THE SIGNPOST said they were three miles from Clarion and the map said this was a town of some size lying astride a national highway. It was to be avoided. They had lost a week's traveling by a stop to get in the corn crop of a sick old man. They worked from sunrise to sunset for seven days and when the golden ears were neatly stored in the cribs were told better get by before they got the law put on them.

"Rub of the green, William," Mr. Sparhawk said philosophically as they headed in the direction of Clarion. Justin was glad to get away on any terms. The work had been nothing to him; he was inured to fatigue and hunger. The last week had been agony, every hour of it. Finally Mr. Sparhawk was forced to say gently: "Washington, Pennsylvania, won't run away, William. Surely we are doing as much good here as we could do there?"

And that meant shit up. There Justin had to leave it. It was barely possible that the old man might continue to tolerate his presence, might even act as a cover story if he knew that Justin was using him to establish communications with a revolutionary army. It was certain that he could not do it without losing his appearance of blisful sincerity and gentle mania which had carried them through every brush with the occupation.

It was three miles out of Clarion, perhaps halfway on the road to Washington, Pennsylvania, that they met the kid gang. They leaped on Justin and Mr. Sparhawk from the roadside; perhaps some of them swung down cinematically from tree limbs. There may have been two dozen of them, between eight and fifteen years of age. They gave the two travelers the treatment they gave all travelers whom they surprised and outnumbered; they beat and kicked them viciously, robbed them, stripped them to their underwear and moved on, laughing and shouting. Mr. Sparhawk, after moving his jaw tentatively, mumbled between bruised lips: "You did well not to resist, William. Such groups have been known to kill."

"I couldn't resist, damn it!" Justin snorted. "The little demons were all over us. I'd like to meet just four of them in a dark alley some time. I think I've got a couple of broken ribs . . ."

He and Mr. Sparhawk helped each other to get up; they hobbled down the road.

"Look," Justin said, alarmed. "That'll take us to Clarion. Township seat, ten thousand people, U. S. 322, a Red garrison for sure. Let's figure a detour."

"We must find a garrison of the occupying forces," Mr. Sparhawk said severely. "We must report this incident. We owe it to those boys; we must stop them before they do irreparable damage to their souls. I have, thank God, been privileged to report five such wandering bands and each one was rounded up within a day or two. Whatever penalties were exacted from them, they were at least stopped in their careers."

The mad reasoning on alien values would work. Justin knew it. They would be two lunatics wandering into town half-naked in late October, gently and without acrimony urging that the authorities pick up the kid gang without ado—for the good of their souls.

On to Clarion, Pennsylvania.

LATELY November brought a cold snap and wet heavy snow. They were floundering, calf-deep, by afternoon along a black top between Leechburg and North Vandegrift, about two hundred miles beeline from Norton, about fifty miles from Washington, Pennsylvania. It was clear that the journey would soon be over. Justin had lost twenty pounds and gained an impatient respect for Mr. Sparhawk's innocent tenacity.

He had seen a countryside under lock and key, assuming sullenly the ancient peasant status never known before on the continent. They had bypassed manufacturing towns—Mr. Sparhawk believed in reasonable caution until his disciple's spiritual qualities were more highly developed—and so had not seen the worst happening to the people.

A woman in an ancient Model-A sedan stopped and called them: "Want a lift, boys?" It was the first time this had happened in their month on the road. She had a gas ration sticker on her windshield and the trunk of the car, which was a trunk, and not a streamlined cavern, stood half open. It was crammed with canned goods.

The woman was fat, red-faced and smiling. Strangely, her fat was not the waxy loosely attached potato fat of an all-starch diet; it was firm plumpness. In the fall of 1935 it meant villainy.

"No thank you, madam," Justin said.

Beside him Mr. Sparhawk looked moish. "I think we ought to, William," he said gently. "Madam, we'll be pleased to ride with you." Re-signedly Justin got in.

She out-talked Mr. Sparhawk for ten miles. She was the widowed Mrs. Elphinstone. She had a farm worked by six good-for-nothing orphans she boarded for the county out of the goodness of her heart. She didn't believe in saying anything about a person if you couldn't say anything good, but . . .

It was common knowledge about the Baptist preacher and Miss Lesh.

But that shouldn't surprise you because Miss Lesh had died in a madhouse even if they called it a rest home. When it's in the blood there's nothing you can do.

Mr. Tebbets the lawyer was drunk again when she was in town. Everybody knew he bought it from Mrs. Grassman whose husband drank himself to death on home-brew and somebody should tell The Authorities before more damage was done.

But it was probably Mr. Tebbets' conscience that drove him to drink, the way he swindled the Murdocks out of their insurance money.

Not that Tebbets was the worst of the gang; she wasn't a prude, dear no, but the way his crony Dr. Reeves carried on before right-minded people ran him out of town, why she herself knew a girl who had been given gas by Dr. Reeves for an extraction and woke to find her brassiere unhooked.

Though it was hard to see why the little slut—it was Margie Endicott she should care, since every boy in the Senior High had done at least as much.

And if the truth were known . . . She saw a couple walking along the road and stopped the car. They were a farmer and his wife; each carried a sack. "Hello, Elsie," the man said nervously. His wife looked murder and said nothing.

"Why, Ralph and Kate, imagine running into you here! Where you going?"

"Little walk," the man muttered. "Mrs. Elphinstone was staring at their sacks, licking her lips. "The Ladies," she said, "are getting up a little luncheon, I meant to tell you. Times being what they are, we're all chipping in on the eatables. You're invited of course, Kate." Her voice became shrill and childish. "Now I was just wondering if you'd like to save a trip by handing over any little thing you have with you—for the Ladies."

"We haven't got anything," the farmer's wife said sharply. "My goodness, isn't that too bad? I heard somebody around your way butchered a hog and I thought you might have some old scraps of it. For the Ladies."

The farmer rummaged in his sack and pulled out a four-pound fitch of bacon. Naked hatred was in his eyes. He chucked it into the car beside the woman. "Come on," he said to his wife flatly. She shouldered her sack and they walked on through the swirling snow.

Justin knew he was riding with a woman who one of these days would be murdered.

She started the car. "The Perkins-sons," she said. "Worthless, lawless trash. I've got half a mind to tell Lieutenant Sokoloff they've been butchering without a permit—but forevermore, who doesn't?" She turned around as she drove to smile at her passengers. "What I say is, the important thing is not to get caught at it." The car eased into the right-hand roadside ditch before she turned back to her driving; she squawked, spun the wheels and killed the motor.

"Isn't that awful? I wonder if you boys'd try what you can do. I'll just stay here in case you need help from the engine . . ."

They got out in the snow and heaved and looked for rocks to lay as a trend under the spinning wheels and from time to time asked her to try driving out. They got snow spun into their faces and bruised their fingers on frozen rocks. They talked in whispers. The woman's, ruddy face was hanging out the window; she was watching with interest.

"Blackmailing old . . ."

"Steady on, William."

"We shouldn't have got in the car."

"Is her salvation unimportant for some reason known to you? We must give each person we meet his or her chance."

"The only way you can save that type is with a firing squad. The neighborhood gossip, the village terror, hand in hand with the Reds. She'll get her way Croley's going to."

"Mr. Croley has been charitable to me."

"Sure. Croley's smart enough to play all the sides—not like her.” Justin pounded a rock under the wheel with another rock. “Give her a try, ma’am,” he said aloud.

“I certainly hope it works, boys,” she said. “I’m getting awfully chilly.” She roared the motor, let in her clutch and was off in a shower of slash and small zones.

Justin waited for her to stop on the road for them but she chugged on. When the Ford vanished around a distant curve he did some swearing and wound up: “At least we don’t have to listen to her any more.”

“No,” Mr. Sparhawk said, and for a moment Justin thought the look he gave him was compassionate.

The woman must have hurried home and put in a phone call. Half an hour later a pair of Red jeeps overtook them. An hour later they were being booked for sabotage, counter-revolutionary wrecking and sedition in what had once been the principal’s office of the Lechburg Consolidated School.

The next day they were on the Conveyor.

JUSTIN sat in the dark and absently rubbed his aching neck. The session had lasted for six hours, and Lieutenant Sokoloff had been yawning at the end of it. It was not surprising; Sokoloff was merely a cop and he himself was merely a vagrant against whom a routine accusation had been brought. Sokoloff would sleep now for eight hours; Justin would be kept awake and presumably irritated just below the threshold of pain by irregular switching on and off of the lights, peering guards with raucous orders, the steel-pipe bunk without bedding to corrugate his back.

Then, rested and refreshed, Sokoloff would plump himself into a padded swivel chair, Justin would sit bolt upright on a too-low stool, the dazzling light would be switched on and the interrogation would proceed.

The bright cell lights flashed on and a soldier’s heavy face peered through the bars. He pounded on them with a nightstick and growled: “Prisoner hobey hard-eras,” and stood waiting. Justin obediently went and laid down on the steel-pipe cot, face up, hands at his side, and closed his eyes. The light beat through his eyelids. The transverse pipes bit into his heel tendons, his calves, thighs, buttocks, back, neck and skull. Orders were being obeyed. He was not being physically tortured. He was merely lying on a bunk, and if the bunk were somewhat uncomfortable, what in heaven’s name could you expect to find in a detention cell? Their strange passion for legality again—a sort of legality, at least.

It showed up strongly in the questions during interrogation. Justin was at sea several times until he inferred the hypothesis behind such a question as: “Did the prisoner ever take part in the workers’ struggle before organized assistance to the clandestine NAFDR began to arrive?” What Sokoloff wanted to know was, had Justin been a Communist before the war. Justin had not been a Communist before the war, and if he answered “no” to the question as Sokoloff phrased it he was saying a great deal more than that he had not been a Communist before the war. He was admitting Sokoloff’s premise about “organized assistance to the clandestine NAFDR.” He was agreeing with Sokoloff that the war was not a war of aggression at all but an internal revolution by the Communist Party with some assistance from the Soviet Union and the Chinese People’s Republic. Therefore he could not answer such questions yes or no, and therefore Sokoloff became very angry and turned the light that glared in his eyes brighter. But that wasn't torture, of course. Could one expect an interrogation room to function without a light by which notes could be jotted and the expression of the prisoner observed? Justin didn't know where Mr. Sparhawk was except that he was in some place exactly like this, or what he was doing except that it was exactly what Justin was doing: hanging on.

A sacrament, Mr. Sparhawk called it, innocently blasphemous.

"Is the prisoner aware that to absent oneself from one's assigned agricultural holdings is sabotage of food production?"

"Spreading the Word of God comes first, Lieut. Sokoloff. Under the guarantee of religious freedom of the North American People's Democratic Republic no functionary is empowered to interfere with the private or public worship of a religious body."

"The passion for legality cut both ways."

"The prisoner is not a religious body!"

"I consider myself the disciple of Mr. Sparhawk, Lieut. Sokoloff, and I consider Mr. Sparhawk a lay preacher."

"What is the name of your religion?"

"It has no name. It incorporates what Mr. Sparhawk finds inspired in all religions."

"There are no such religions. The prisoner is a poseur. Is the prisoner aware that he has been denounced as a counter-revolutionary wrecking party by a loyal adherent of the NAPDR to whom he made inflammatory and seditious speeches?"

"If you please, lieutenant, I made no speeches to the lady you mean. I would have spoken to her about God—but I never got the chance."

Sokoloff's face, dim on the fringes of the dazzling interrogation light, wrinkled into a brief grin. He knew the lady, then.

And so it went for six hours, the two of them pounding each other with stuffed clubs labeled respectively SABOTAGE and FREEDOM OF WORSHIP.

JUSTIN shifted on the bunk, acutely uncomfortable. That was supposed to be Lieut. Sokoloff's margin of victory. The lieutenant would rest well; he would rest not at all. The next session he would swing his padded club with less vigor while Sokoloff's blows would be as strong as ever. At last, after a week or so of interrupted sleep, scanty meals, inflamed eyelids and backache, Lieut. Sokoloff would be flailing away as hard as ever and he would sit apathetically, without the strength or spirit to strike a blow. He would sign anything, admit anything, to sleep on a cement floor instead of the steel-pipe bunk.

In theory.

He tried one of Mr. Sparhawk's heathen tricks which had served him on rainy nights before. He willed his muscles to relax one by one, from his toes up. He sent out his will to gather up his aches into a ball twelve inches in diameter and he floated the ball twelve inches above his forehead where he could inspect it impersonally. The distractions kept trying to crowd in, but he succeeded in keeping them out by not giving a damn about them. When the ball slowly began to sag down and threatened to re-enter his body he thought relaxedly that to do so would result in the discovery of the bombardment satellite and that therefore the ball should continue to float. It did, and he slept. Much better than young Lieut. Sokoloff who was tossing and turning and worrying about what to do with these lunatics he had been saddled with by that horrible woman.

THE private ceremoniously kicked Mr. Sparhawk in the seat, booting him over the township line. Justin, moving fast, stepped across without assistance. They started down the road.

Behind them Lieut. Sokoloff, dark bags under his eyes, yelled, ". . . and don't you ever come back into this area again, do you hear me?"

Mr. Sparhawk turned and waved. "Yes, lieutenant. God bless you."

They heard the jeep start up and roar away.

They had been five days on the Conveyor. They were skin and bones; their backs and buttocks were covered with bruises from all the hours spent rigid on the pipe bunks and hard interrogation light and the lights in their cells. They were filthy; it was part of the system to allow no water for washing and thereby further break down the morale of the prisoner. Mr. Sparhawk's left thumb and index finger were broken and splinted; a guard, strictly against orders, had whacked him with his nightstick. Six of Justin's molars had been pulled; the unit dentist had examined them, decided fillings were needed and done considerable drilling before further deciding they could not be saved after all. She had done her work without anaesthetic and Lieut. Sokoloff had stood by to distract the prisoner by chatting about the pleasures of the pre-trial cells, which were furnished with regular army cots. These pre-trial cells were only for prisoners who had cleared all preliminary hurdles, such as the signing of confessions.

His jaws ached horribly, he had ridden the Conveyor for five days and they were walking into the town of Washington, Pennsylvania.

IV

THEY signed in first thing in the Transients book of the local SMGU. They explained, to a puzzled English-speaking sergeant that they were ministers of the gospel, and that he might check with his neighboring SMGU where, through a misunderstanding, they had been detained, interrogated and cleared. Then—it was about noon—they made their pitch on a busy corner of the main shopping street.

Mr. Sparhawk lectured on Conscience and Submission; Justin borrowed a hat and passed it. One of the people who dropped in coins was the salesman from Bee-Jay. "Meet me later," Justin muttered. The man gave him a brief appraising stare and walked away.

After the lecture they almost quarrelled. Justin was for finding a rooming house with a bath and taking a week's lodgings. Mr. Sparhawk, now that Justin's irrational desire to see Washington, Pennsylvania, had been gratified, was for a one-day stay mostly devoted to preaching.

They had dinner in a tavern, Mr. Sparhawk relenting to the point of taking a glass of watery beer and allowing Justin one. But no matter how longingly the disciple eyed the steam table of sausages and roast horsemeat they ate the vegetable plate.

The dispute was still unresolved when they checked in at a rooming house down near the railroad tracks. Justin's jaws were aching badly but he didn't care. The Bee-Jay salesman had passed by the tavern and glanced in while they were eating. The contact had not been broken. Surely they were being followed and marked . . .

They bathed in turn, very gratefully, and turned in. Mr. Sparhawk slept on the floor and laughed when Justin offered him the bed. Justin understood the laughter an hour later while he tossed and turned and angrily commanded his muscles to relax. He had made up his mind at last to spread a blanket on the floor and sleep there himself when he heard a scratching on the door.

The long ordeal was ended. He opened up. It was the Bee-Jay salesman, of course, and two other men. They all wore coveralls and carried telephone linemen's gear in broad leather belts.

"Come along," the salesman said softly. "We have a truck. And guns."

He assumed they would have guns. "We don't have to wake up the old man," he whispered to one of them who was stooping over Mr. Sparhawk. "He's coming," the man said, and shook him.

"Friends of mine, Mr. Sparhawk," Justin whispered. "We're taking a short trip."

"Yeah," said the salesman. He raised his hand. "No arguments. Explain everything later."

"I never argue," Mr. Sparhawk whispered loftily, and they dressed and went quietly down the stairs, the salesman in front of them and the two strangers behind. The truck was an olive-green A.T.&T. cab-over-engine repair job, the kind of truck that can appear anywhere in the continent without a word of comment or stir of interest as long as there is a telephone within fifty miles. Justin was struck by the brilliant simplicity of the idea. When they were settled in the dark body of the truck with the two strangers he started to say as much. They told him to be quiet. He didn't like their manner, but set it down to the strain they were feeding on a risky mission.

Mr. Sparhawk settled down on the floor in the padmasana posture while the truck bumped over a lot of railroad tracks and made a lot of left and right turns and a couple of U turns that could only have been meant to confuse their sense of direction. In half an hour the truck stopped definitely, the hand brake rasped along its ratchets and the motor stopped.

They hustled Justin and Mr. Sparhawk out of the truck onto a dimly lit loading deck of concrete. Down a concrete corridor where fork hoists and stacks of pallets stood. Past a thousand stacked new milk cans shining dully. Past crates of pitcher pump and a thousand cream separators. Into a concrete room where a dozen men awaited them. When the door rolled shut behind them Justin weakly said: "I'm glad to see you." But he already knew that it was no joyful reunion but a trial.

"Now we can talk," the Bee-Jay salesman said grimly.

"Yes," said Justin between his teeth. Then he yelled at them: "Why was Chiunga County deserted?"

"Their faces were shocked. The trapped mouse had turned and bitten them on the finger.

"Not that you give a damn," Justin said, "but Chiunga happens to be the key to the whole situation, as you know if your organization were conducted sensibly. Why haven't we had any couriers? Why don't you answer us on the dry wire? Why were we left to rot?"

"While we're asking questions, William," Mr. Sparhawk said mildly, "what on earth are you talking about?"

They ignored him. The Bee-Jay salesman said slowly: "You might as well know my name, Justin. Sam Lowenthal. I used to be a civilian consultant to the Psychological Warfare Branch. You don't have to know who all these people are. It's enough to say that they constitute a court martial of the United States Army. You're on trial for treason. We suspect you of being a stool pigeon, Justin. We thought so when we got a dry-wire message that somebody named Justin had important information for a top-contact team. We sent in the team—and never heard from it again.

"Now we find you here in a fairly important sub-headquarters town after a 250-mile journey. People don't make such journeys nowadays—not unless they're helped either by us or their friends the Reds. And we know we didn't help you. And with you is an unexplained person.

That was with a jerk of the thumb at Mr. Sparhawk, who had indignantly withdrawn into the padmasana. Justin could see from the shape of his mouth that he was meditating on the syllable "Oh."

"And once you're here you brazenly try to make contact with us. Our idea, Justin, is that this is a naive attempt—motivated by Marxist fanaticism, perhaps—to infiltrate our group and put the finger on us for the Reds. If you have anything to say, speak up—but I suspect you're going to wind up tonight in the Bee-Jay fertilizer division."

The first thing Justin did was take off his shirt. They gasped at the bruises and sores. He told them: "They also drilled my teeth for six hours the other day. Can any of you comfortable masterminds say as much? No, I didn't break. That's because I've learned a great many things from the eccentric gentleman sitting in the corner there. One of them was patience and another was recklessness. You people could use some of both.

"I believe you when you tell me the senator and his two friends disappeared after they interviewed me. People are disappearing all the time in this year of grace. I presume they used their razor blades before they were questioned, so my information died with them. Now listen to it this time.

"Yankee Doodle was a diversionary dummy. The real bombardment satellite, about ninety-nine percent completed, is under Prospect Hill in Chiunga County, in a limestone cavern. It needs electronics men and electronics parts. It needs an ace rocket-interceptor pilot. It needs a bombardier with plenty of VHB time and a back-ground in math. Of course, if you people would rather spend your time hauled up comfortably worrying about stool pigeons, that's your business; I'm not running your campaign for you."

LOWENTHAL was stunned by the outburst. He said shakily: "I used to hear a rumor when I was attached to the AEC—listen, Justin. We'll guarantee you and pass the matter up higher for a decision as soon as possible."

Justin put on his shirt and turned to the door.

"Justin!" Lowenthal snapped, pulling out a .45 pistol.

"Yes?" Justin asked mildly.

"Where do you think you're going?"

"Out."

"I'll kill you if you take another step toward the door."

"I suppose you will. Why should that stop me. Don't you realize I was supposed to be shot for walking two hundred and fifty miles to listen to your drivel about passing it up for a decision? Hell, man, I wasn't supposed to get past one township line, let alone fifty! I was supposed to be shot for storing that bunk of A-bomb you picked up at my place. I was supposed to be shot for not reporting the top-contact crew you sent. I was supposed to be shot for not turning over the bombardment satellite to the Reds as fast as my scared little legs could carry me.

"Go ahead and shoot, man. But if you don't, if by some chance I get out of here, I'm going to rustle up some electronics men, some parts and a crew while you good people are waiting for a decision from higher up. Good-by."

He started for the door again. Lowenthal's pistol slide went back with a click and forward with a thud. "Wait," the psychologist said when Justin put his hand on the door.

"What do you want?" Justin demanded.

"I think," Lowenthal said slowly, "you may have a valid point. Perhaps we do sometimes display a little less divine madness than we ought to—suppose, Justin, I send you off to Chiunga County in a sealed freight car tomorrow with our Dr. Dace. He is the head of research and development for Bee-Jay. We can arrange a break-down from overwork for him."

Justin snapped: "Is your Dr. Dace a satellite crew, a team of electronics men and half a ton of equipment?"

Dace, himself, small, portly, white-haired and mean-eyed, got up and snarled: "You arrogant pup, who the hell do you think you are to survey a bombardment satellite? (Half a ton of equipment)—do you think that's the same as half a ton of candy bars? Now sit down and shut up while we plan this thing through." He suddenly looked conscience-stricken and adled lamely: "Er, naturally, we all appreciate the, uh, heroism you displayed in making the very arduous trip you did to re-establish contact with us..." He trailed off and sat down.

The discussion became general and complicated. After a while Lowenthal dismissed four men who seemed to have nothing to contribute on the technical side. Justin suspected they were to have been the firing squad.

Dace relentlessly probed Justin's every recollection of the satellite's appearance and scribbled notes. Lowenthal tsk-tsks because Justin had left Grable on his own.

"What should I have done?" Justin demanded.

Lowenthal hesitated. "Maybe parked him in the cave. Or killed him."

Justin found himself on his feet raving: "God help the human race if you thugs are its fighters for liberty. If we kill a man like Gribble in the name of security how are we different from the Reds or the Chinese? We don't even have the excuses they have of ignorance and expression and hunger. What kind of cowards are you that you'd kill a sick man so you won't have to worry about betrayal?"

"I saw the Guards break," Sparhawk told them. "I saw the Royal Family captured."

"Take it easy," Lowenthal said. "You'll kill before this is over." Justin sat down, shaking. He knew he would. He also knew the psychologist was deliberately missing the point.

ALITTLE information about the rebellion as a whole seeped out of the general discussion. Justin could gather that there were many areas that had been quarantined like Chianga County as too dangerous to work into the scheme. Elsewhere they had the dry wires, postmen and traveling salesmen for communication. They had seceded professional soldiers across the country—Hawson was Chianga County's leader-to-be.

The situation in the great cities was, either they were very strong at a given time or they were wiped out. The cities offered countless hiding places where arms could be stored and food cached and plans made. They offered countless volunteers—among whom were traitors. There were many people in the cities who had responded to the relentless psychological pressure of Red propaganda and thought they were sincere idealistic Marxists. It was impossible to say without the latest word from the wires whether they had a working organization or a demoralized corporal's guard in, for instance, New York. The organization in New York City had collapsed five times and risen six. Thousands had been shot in roundups; there were always thousands more to recruit.

"We don't think," Lowenthal said slowly, "the Reds realize the magnitude of it. They're hypnotized by their fable of 'counter-revolutionary wrecking.' This handicaps them in dealing with the real situation. That's how the Nazis were handicapped in dealing with underground organizations throughout Europe during World War Two. They were thunderstruck when the French underground recaptured Paris before the Allied troops arrived."

"But the Allied troops were on their way," Justin said pointedly.

"You're right. Perhaps I should have cited the uprising of the Warsaw ghetto where the remnants of the original population organized and supplied an army that held the Nazis at bay for ten days. I had uncles and cousins in Warsaw. I've often wondered since I got into this thing whether they fought in the uprising or whether they were shipped to an extermination camp before it happened."

Justin had been in high school during that war. "How did the uprising come out?" he asked.

"They were killed to the last man, woman and child," Lowenthal said, surprised. "The ghetto was pounded into gravel by artillery."

Dr. Dace snipped: "I'm sick and tired of your Warsaw Concerto, Sam. Let's get on with the work."

But after a while they were talking again. Justin learned that nobody there knew where Headquarters were, that the Russian railroad inspectors were free-wheeling, happy-go-lucky types whom it was easy to hoodwink and possible to bribe, that so far nobody had succeeded in corrupting an MVD man.

THE SITUATION across the Mississippi, under the Chinese, was more urgent than it was in the east under the Russians. The ancient Chinese contempt for human life led to executions for such things as smoking in public. There was some sort of decree posted everywhere in which every American was placed under suspended sentence of death for banditry and terrorism; any noncommissioned officer could execute the sentence for reasons that seemed sufficient to him. However, the language difference made organization and communication much easier. If the American cringed to the color-conscious invader the invader was happy enough about that gratifying fact to neglect training sufficient officers in the difficult English language to police the mails and wires.

Somebody had a watch and announced that it was 4:30 and he for one wanted some sleep.

"One last item," said Dace. "What about him?" That was Mr. Sparhawk, sleeping soundly on the concrete floor. The old man woke up at once and asked mildly: "What about me?"

"I'd like him to come along with us in the freight car," Justin said. "We can keep him in the cave."

"Freight car?" said Mr. Sparhawk disdainfully. "William, how am I supposed to preach and teach in a freight car? You're acting awfully strange, I must say. I had no particular objections about coming to this town, because after all one must go somewhere. But now a freight car and a cave? Too foolish."

Dr. Dace said: "I've heard about this egg. He preaches submission. Furthermore, he's nuts. I say, rub him out."

"What a savage little man you are," Mr. Sparhawk said wonderingly. "You know, it's all very well to talk, but violence won't do. I was a colonel in the Brigade of Guards, gentlemen; I know what I'm saying."

"What are you saying?" Dace bristled.

"Why, that I saw the Guards break under the Russian armored attack on Salisbury Plain. I saw the capture of the Royal Family with my own eyes. Her Majesty, of course, was superb. But it was defeat, you know. That was when I discovered there was a basic mistake. If the Guards could be broken and Her Majesty captured, obviously we'd been mistaken all along with our guns and rockets and bombs and the answer lay elsewhere. Since then, I've been seeking it, gentlemen . . ."

"Mr. Sparhawk," Justin said, "I wish you'd come along. I couldn't have got this far without you. I don't know whether I can finish it without you."

"You want me for a mascot?" the old man asked wryly.

"Not a mascot. As—as a chaplain, I suppose," Justin said.

"Well—I'll come along," Mr. Sparhawk said. "As a chaplain. You bloody-minded individuals can use some spiritual ministrations in any case."

Justin, without knowing why, felt immensely relieved. More, he had the impression that everybody in the concrete storeroom was too.

WHERE the hell have you been?" demanded Gus Feinblatt in an angry whisper.

"They were in front of Croley's store in Norton; Justin had walked down for sign-in day. The MVD storekeeper was presiding inside the store over the book. Men and women apatheticsly walked in from time to time, found their place on the page and signed. Then they stood around, or bought something, or just walked out.

"Where the hell were you last sign-in? For that matter, where the hell have you been all month?" whispered Feinblatt. "We had Stan Potocki sign in for you. When we found you were gone and that nut Griddle of yours couldn't tell us anything we had Stan practice for a week and then come in with a bunch of us early to sign for himself and another bunch late to sign for you. We could have been shot!

You just shouldn't have done it, Billy!" "I had to," Justin said. "Thanks, Gus." He reached into his pocket and found a penny, a steel disc with a wood-grained star on one side and the head of Tom Paine on the other. "Here," he said. "Christmas Eve." Gus took the penny automatically, looked bewildered, and Justin went into the store.

"Got name?" the sergeant scowled.

"Mayb' c'mon' Youstin," Billy said.

"Ferner."

The sergeant put his finger on the rectangle. He glanced at Justin and looked a little puzzled. Justin took the pen and looked at the signature above. It was a pretty bad imitation Potocki had done. With his trained fingers he imitated the imitation, trying not to draw the letters too obviously. It passed the sergeant's comparison. Whether it would pass the later, leisurely comparison of a headquarters officer who was at least a part-time handwriting expert, he did not know. He picked up a comic book—Joe Hill, Hero of Labor—and read for half an hour.

At twelve noon a jeep came by for the sergeant; he closed his book grimly and drove off with it to the next hamlet down the line.

The store came to life then. Mr. Croley emerged from his cubbyhole to wait, dead-pan, for customers to speak up. He sold some handkerchiefs, fence staples, seed cake, cheese, imitation candy and dark-grey bread in a little flurry of business activity and then the store was empty again. Justin went to the counter.

"I'd like to talk in your office," he said. The storekeeper lifted the counter flap and went in first. "I hear you have some surplus stuff."

Croley sat at his small roll-top desk with the stuffed pigeonholes and waited. Justin knew for what. He took out a bundle of money, big bills from Lowenthal's safe.

"Don't know any," Croley said. "Know where there is some, maybe. Big difference."

"Yeah. Big difference. Well, do you know where there might be some sacks of flour, dried peas and beans? And case lots of canned horsemeat, sugar, dried eggs and tea?"

"Expensive stuff."

Justin spread out the bills in a fan. Croley took them and said ritualistically: "I dunno for sure but I think maybe Mrs. Sprenger down past the gravel pit might be able to help you. I'll just write her a note about it."

He wrote a note to Mrs. Sprenger on the back of an old sales slip and sealed it with a blob of flour paste. Justin got a glimpse, unavoidable in the tiny place unless he had turned his back, and saw that it seemed to be about flour seeds.

Croley handed him the note and Justin started to leave. Transaction over. End of incident. But Croley detained him. "Imagine you're getting around," the storekeeper said with a wintry little smile.

"Maybe," Justin said cautiously. So the old drunk was adding up his absence — he noticed it, of course. Croley noticed everything—and the big bill Justin counted on Croley's own illegal part in the black-market transaction to keep his mouth shut. Counted too far? But Croley said: "Anything I can do for you, let me know." And shook his hand!

In a daze, Justin said: "Christmas Eve," and gave him a penny. Croley was looking at it in bewilderment as he left.

JUSTIN thought he had Croley figured. The old man was now firmly poised on the fence. Without being committed in any way whatsoever he was now ready to jump to either side. Never underestimate the adaptability of a Croley, Justin told himself.

Gus had loaded his feed on the wagon. It was a pitifully small load, and his harness were gaunt.

"Business proposition, Gus," Justin called up to him. "Short trip down Cannon Road, light work, big pay."

"Okay," Gus said disconsolately. Justin climbed up and Gus flapped his reins on the horses' backs. The wagon creaked down Cannon Road toward the gravel pit.

"I should have warned you," Gus said bitterly. "You're taking a chance being seen with me. I'm under suspicion as a dangerous conspirator—to be exact, a rootless Zionist cosmopolitan. The MVD came around last week. They searched the house. They took our Menorah, the Sabbath candlestick I haven't lit since Pop died. And in the attic they found the real evidence. A bunch of mildewed hassidim, pass-over prayer books I haven't used for twenty years. And Grampa's Talmud in forty little volumes of Hebrew and Aramaic which I can't read. That makes me a rootless-internationalist-cosmopolitan-cryptofascist-Zionist conspirator. They warned me to keep my nose clean. I guess they'll be back one of these days when they haven't got anything better to do and haul us away." He lapsed into silence.

"Stop at Mrs. Sprenger's," Justin said.

"The birdlike old lady read the note in terror, whispered to herself: 'I wish I didn't have to—' and showed them to the cistern in the back yard. The two of them levered its concrete slab cover aside. There was a ladder and the cistern was stacked with provisions.

"Please," Mrs. Sprenger begged them, "please don't take more than the note says. He thinks I take the things myself but I wouldn't do anything like that. Please don't make a mistake in counting."

They carried up the food and loaded the wagon, hiding it under the original load of fodder.

"Christmas Eve," Justin said to Mrs. Sprenger. And gave her a penny.

"Thank you," she said faintly.

Driving away Feinblatt asked: "What's this Christmas-Eve-and-penny routine, Billy?"

"Just a habit I have."

"You didn't have it a month ago. Where've you been? You look different. You lost some weight, but your whole face looks different."

"I had some teeth pulled."

"I see; that would do it, Billy, stop me if I'm going offside, but did you have your teeth pulled like, say, the Lacey's down at Four Corners?"

"That's the way."

They were heading up Oak Hill Road by then and Justin was debating furiously with himself. He had to start somewhere, he had to start with someone. There'd never be a better starting place than strong, steady, bitter Gus Feinblatt. But he didn't want to; he didn't dare. He was learning the difference between trusting only yourself and trusting others. It was an agonizing difference.

Stalling deliberately he asked: "What'll you have for your share of the loot?"

"I don't care. Some of the beans and flour, I suppose. We're sick of potatoes. Lord, what a winter this is going to be! I'm lucky to have Tony and Phony here; they can haul wood so I can spend my time bucking and splitting. I guess we'll make out if we close off most of the house and if we can get another grate for the stove. The old one's about burned through. They aren't supposed to go fifteen years without a replacement."

"Turn right," Justin said when they reached the fork that led on the left to his place and on the right to Prospect Hill.

"What for, Billy?"

"There's something I want to show you. And something I want to ask you. Look, you rootless Zionist, how'd you like to join a real conspiracy?" The horribly risky job of local recruiting had begun.

NEXT ISSUE: CONCLUSION

WITH THEIR pitifully few weapons, the patriots of Chiungta Center face Christmas Eve—and the uprising. Can they hold off the vengeful Russians long enough to launch the satellite and redeem their freedom?

FIRST PRIZE: $1,500

Ann Henry, of Winnipeg, tells a haunting story of circus life.

SECOND PRIZE: $1,000

Michael Sheldon, of Montreal, writes about a ghost writer.

THIRD PRIZE: $500

Mrs. Doris French, of Ottawa, finds a new plot in politics.

What is a Canadian short story?

AS WE announce here the winners of our latest Short Story Contest, we find it necessary to make a confession. After seven contests in which we've given away $13,000 in prizes we would still be hard put if asked to define what we mean by "a Canadian short story." The only definition we've ever been able to arrive at is a loose one: a Canadian short story is any story written by a resident of Canada. This is not terribly satisfactory for we have seen short stories written by Canadians that deal with New York advertising agencies, Hollywood movie sets, and White Jungle Princesses. Are these really Canadian stories?

On the other hand there are a whole raft of stories so all-fired Canadian they make us wince. There is the Small-Boy-Growing-Up-On-The-Prairies story; the Brave-Farmer-Battling-The-Frontier story; the Heroic-Bush-Pilot-Saving-The-Pretty-Girl story. Nothing is really wrong with these stories except that we've seen too many. We have often wished, a little wistfully, that we could get more stories that were truly Canadian but less self-consciously so: a story about a traveling carnival in Manitoba, say, or a story spoofing the banks, or a story about Canadian politics.

By more than sheer coincidence, perhaps, these are the subjects of the three winning short stories in Maclean's most recent fiction contest. Two of them, we're happy to report, are by writers new to this magazine.

The first prize winner is Ann Maude Henry, of Winnipeg. This will be her first published story.

Mrs. Henry, a Winnipeg Tribune drama editor, ran away to join a circus at sixteen—and that is what happens to the heroine of her story. Perhaps that is what makes this haunting story so real. We would not say it is a Typical Canadian Short Story, but we would say it is an unforgettable one.

Michael Sheldon makes his fourth appearance in Maclean's with his second-prize story about a ghost writer who was really a ghost. Once again he satirizes the conflict between the traditional dignity and high-pressure promotion within the walls of the Bank of Lower Canada. As a ghost story, Mr. Sheldon's work is quite untypical; as a Canadian short story it is quite unconventional. We hope to publish more unconventional Canadian short stories by Mr. Sheldon.

Our third prize-winning story deals with a subject we've always thought was ripe for fiction: Canadian politics. The author is, appropriately, an Ottawa housewife who divides her time between political-party work and writing. She is Mrs. Doris French and her work appears for the first time in Maclean's.

These three stories will be published shortly and will be followed by other stories which failed to win prizes in our contest but which we feel are well worth publishing. One deals with a Saskatchewan prairie town, another is set in a Maritimes fishing village. One takes place on the Toronto subway, another on the Mackenzie River. All are Canadian short stories, though exactly what a Canadian short story is we still wouldn't profess to know.

Ralph Allen Editor
 Pierre Berthiaume Managing Editor
 Leslie F. Hannan Associate Editor
 Blair Fraser Ottawa Editor
 Art Director: Gene Alliman, Assistant: Desmond English
 Assistant Editors: Fred Bodsworth, N. O. Salsinger, Robert Collins, John Gray, Ed Hausman, Sidney Katz, Keith A. Knowlton, David MacDonald, Herbert Manning,
 McKenzie Porter, Ian Standers, James Tyrwhitt
 Editorial Assistants: Jan Adams, Joan Dory, Lois Hamilton, Carol Lindsay, Jane Weisberger.

Douglas M. Gowdy Manager
 Hall Limson Advertising Manager
 B. Wes Spicer Advertising Production Manager
 R. Douglas Myles Circulation Manager

Editorial, Circulation & Advertising Offices:
 481 University Avenue, Toronto 2, Canada

CONTENTS

Vol. 68 JUNE 11, 1955 No. 12

Cover Painting by James Hill

Articles

A Report on Eating

OUR CHANGING EATING HABITS. Sidney Katz	11
ARE WE EATING TOO MUCH? The Eating Kete ..	14
HOW LONG CAN THE LARDY KEEP US EATING? Norman J. Bemill	16
THE COURAGEOUS COMEBACK OF ALYS ROBI. Ken Johnston	20
OSMOND KENDALL'S MARVELOUS MUSIC MACHINE. Alan Phillips	22
THE LAWYER WHO NEVER WINS A CASE. Norman Salsinger	24
THE GREAT HERRING MYSTERY. Norman Salsinger	26
THE WORLD'S FIRST DOG PSYCHIATRIST. Dorothy Sangster	30
WE'RE OFF TO MARS. Parke Cummings	31
THE BEST WAY TO TAKE A HOLIDAY. Fred Bodsworth	32

Fiction

HOT THIS AUGUST. Conclusion. C. M. Kornbluth ..	28
---	----

Departments

LONDON LETTER. Beverley Baxter	4
BACKSTAGE AT OTTAWA. Blair Fraser	7
MAISIE'S MOVIES. Based by Clyde Gilmour ..	8
MACLEAN'S MOVIES. Based by Clyde Gilmour ..	26
JASPER. Cartoon by Simpkins	43
IN THE EDITORS' CONFIDENCE	102
PARADE	104

PHOTOGRAPHS IN THIS ISSUE

By — Dan Longford (27), Capital Press (2), Wild World (4), Ken Bell (11, 16, 17, 18, 19), Paul Rickett (12, 13, 20), Basil Zorov (20, 21), Walter Curtin (22, 23, 26, 27, 44), Peter Crydwan (24, 25, 32, 33), National Film Board (26), Atlantic Biologi- cal Station (27), Margaret Bodsworth (32), Fred Bodsworth (34), Bruno of Hollywood (46).

From the bushes by the roadblock Justin and his squad sniped at the convoy. The .22 got a captain.

NOT THIS AUGUST

At zero hour Betsy threw the firebombs that set the country ablaze.
Could the motley handful of Resistance fighters hold the Russians until the vital rocket ship took command of the skies?

"CHRISTMAS EVE," Billy Justin said as he handed a penny to Croley, the turncoat storekeeper of Norton, N.Y. Though he didn't know what it meant, Croley figured the password was a sign for him to change sides again and latch onto the Underground movement. This was the first stage of the rebellion against the Communist troops who had occupied North America for the seven months since the capitulation of the United States, the last Western nation to hold out against the combined forces of Russia and Red China.

It was November, 1965. Justin, thirty-seven-year-old commercial artist turned dairy farmer, was the reluctant trigger man for the Chiung County resistance group led by legless General Hollerith, Betsy Cardew and Grishole, the ex-Pentagon scientist. It was Justin who had undertaken the perilous journey to Washington, masking his mission by posing as the disciple of the eccentric preacher Mr. Sparhawk. Even Russian torture hadn't forced

BY C. M. KORNBLUTH

ILLUSTRATED BY DON ANDERSON

Justin to reveal the secret he was carrying to national Resistance leaders—the fact that the West's last weapon, a bombardment satellite that could launch itself into outer space and lay siege to enemy capitals, lay hidden in an Underground factory under Prospect Hill.

Back in Chiung County, Justin began the dangerous business of rounding up guerrilla troops for a Christmas Eve uprising. He chose as his first recruit loyal, sardonic Gus Feinblatt, the Jewish farmer whom the MVD already suspected of "disloyalty to the North American People's Democratic Republic."

"Turn up the road to Prospect Hill, Gus," Justin said. "There's something I want to show you. And something I want to ask you."

The horribly risky job of local recruiting had begun.

THREE

NOVEMBER 18TH . . . The farmer lay trembling with cold on the concrete basement floor of the Chiung Junior High cellar.

"To your feet, please," the bored lieutenant said. The farmer tried to get up but his knees betrayed him. He collapsed again and whispered from the floor: "I told you I don't know what you're talking about, mister. I told you I just got in the habit because everybody was doing it and I didn't mean anything."

"To your feet, please," said the lieutenant. "Now sit on the stool again." He took a deep breath and roared in the exhausted man's face: "Do you think I'm a child to be taken in by fairy stories? The prisoner is lying! The prisoner knows very well that the greeting 'Christmas Eve' with the passing of a coin is a symbol of defiance!" He turned down the dazzling light that reddened the farmer's eyes and equally turned down his voice to a murmur. "You see, Mr. Firstman, we know the truth. Why are you keeping us awake with this stubbornness?"

You could be in bed now if you'd just said an hour ago that it's merely a token of resistance, a sort of game, merely. What do you say, Mr. Firstman; will you be a sport and let us all get some sleep?"

"All right," the farmer screamed. "All right, I guess maybe it was. I guess we got a kick out of it, it was like a password, something you Reds didn't know anything about. Call it anything you want to!"

This took the light down another notch. The lieutenant offered him a cigarette and a light and cooed: "Please, Mr. Firstman, what we want is not the point. We hope you'll help because whoever planted this dangerous seed wishes you and your friends no good. You're in trouble now in a way, but it's not your fault; the blame lies with whoever began this silly business. We only want you to help us find him, and certainly you don't owe him any friendship the way he's landed you here."

Firstman swayed on the stool after two deep drags at his cigarette. "I don't know who started it," he said stubbornly. "Like I said, everybody started to say it and pass pennies around but that's all I—"

The lieutenant plucked the cigarette from his lips and snarled: "There is no need to lie to us, prisoner." And again the light blazed into his red-rimmed eyes.

Two hours later he signed the confession and tumbled into his cot, snoring.

The lieutenant studied the document with a look of deep disgust; the captain to whom he reported came in and caught him scowling.

"And what's wrong, Gergoi Ivanovitch?"

"Nothing, Pavel Gergoievitch. Also everything. Farmer Firstman has signed an admission of his guilt. In principle, so he should have; his attitude was contemptuous and it was clear to me that even if he had not so far engaged in wrecking he certainly would when the occasion presented itself."

"What about 'Christmas' Continued on page 57

Chiung Center woke up screaming. Gritting her teeth, Betsy Cardew quickly turned the town into an inferno.

Not This August

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 29

Eve, Sergei Ivanovitch?" the captain asked, beginning to set up the chessmen for their game.

The lieutenant's lips went tight. "Christmas Eve" was the captain's discovery, and on the strength of it the captain hoped to be a major soon. "It seems to mean 'He in the sky,' Pavel Guegrivitch. If you know the phrase?"

"Approximately the same as Nietcheo," the captain sighed. "I feared as much." He moved pawn to king four. Immensely relieved, the lieutenant sat down and played the queen's pawn gambit. "Administrative disposal!" he asked.

Pawn took pawn. The captain nodded yes.

The lieutenant pursued two trains of thought simultaneously. One concerned the "administrative disposal" of Farmer Firstman; it would be his job to administratively dispose of him with a pistol bullet in the back of the neck; he was wondering which pistol to use . . . his cherished, the souvenir Colt .45 was far too heavy for the job. The other concerned the margin by which he should lose the chess game to the captain.

The captain said abruptly: "We should sweat a few more of those Christmas-Eve-ayers, Sergei Ivanovitch, but I will understand if results are negative. One cannot be right every time."

The lieutenant suppressed a smile. The captain felt self-pity, and his course was now clear. It was his duty to be roundly trounced in a dozen moves.

NOVEMBER 20th. . . temperatures seasonably cold with snow flurries over the northeast and light variable winds.

The proclamation left by the corporation in the jeep said the indigenous population was ordered to discontinue the faddish, slang salutation "Christmas Eve" forthwith. For the said phrase could be substituted any one of the traditional cultural salutations and farewells in the following list:

Ah, good day sir (or madame)!

How are things (first name of person addressed)?

Mr. Croley looked it over word by word in his empty store, then slowly tucked it to his bulletin board and waited.

Lunk old Mark Tryon came in after a while and asked, "Got any white bread?"

Mr. Croley took a huge loaf of dark rye bread from its screened box in answer to that.

"Cut me off two pounds," Tryon said. "I s'pose you couldn't slice it?"

Mr. Croley shook his head once and measured carefully to cut off two pounds. Tryon read the placard meanwhile. He turned from it, dead pan, to pick up his chunk of bread and put down his dollar.

"Christmas Eve," Mr. Croley said, shoving back a penny change at him.

Tryon blinked, said furtively: "Christmas Eve," glanced at the placard and scuttled out with the bread under his arm.

Mr. Croley looked after him for a moment and then turned to check through the credit books on the wide-spread rack. He worked through the A's noting who was over five dollars, who over ten, who over fifteen. "Sir or madame!" he snorted to himself silently.

November 23rd. . . Stan Potocki and his wife were out in the crisp cold butchering hogs. A huge fire roared and stank, for as they boned the meat they threw bones and gristle onto the blazing chunks. It was a funny way to butcher. Stan sawed and sliced, his wife dragged cuts away to hang in the barn and between times kept herself busy digging in a row of barrels. When she finished the barrels would be flush with the ground, filled with brine and pork, covered with the winter wood-pile.

Mrs. Potocki leaned on her shovel for a moment, stamping her feet in the powdery snow. "Mrs. Winant didn't say anything when I met her," she said.

"Henry Winant's yellow," Potocki grunted. "Killing ten sheep. Maybe more later, Stan, but I can't tell him hog cholera got my sheep, ya know." He was imitating Henry Winant's nasal twang. "I told him wild dogs could just as easy kill twenty as ten, but he's yellow. Got to face up to the Agro man anyway, why not do it for twenty sheep?" He whetted his butcher knife and stuck another pig in the throat. Inside he was already rehearsing his story for the Agro man. Hog cholera, sudden outbreak. Had to slaughter and burn 'em fast, lieutenant, you being an Agro man know how it is with cholera. Wanna see the bones and ash? I'll get a shovel, buried 'em right here. . .

"Stan," his wife said.

He stopped and patiently began to wet his butcher knife.

"Stan, what's gonna happen on Christmas Eve?"

He said slowly: "I don't know. I wish to hell I did. Whatever happens, we'll take it as it comes."

"I guess," she said, "hiding the por-k's got something to do with it?"

"I guess," he said shortly, and laid down his whetstone and tried his butcher knife on his thumb carefully.

November 23rd . . . The old phenomenon of persecution, the one that persecutors never learn was working itself out again. The Feinblatts were getting ready for dinner. In a bungling way it was as kosher as they could manage, considering that they had not kept a ritual kitchen since Gus' father died years before.

Mrs. Feinblatt was worrying over which dish towel was which. Did the red band mean meat dishes and the blue band mean milk dishes, or was it vice versa? She had forgotten; she'd have to write it down somewhere. Kosher was a nuisance, no denying it, but a nuisance with compensations. Nowadays when they had so little they had at least this feeling that they were a link in a chain through fifty centuries . . .

Gus was finishing a report on a lost heifer. "Condition of fence, time last see, direction of hoofprints . . ." It had to be turned in to the Agro man when he made his rounds. He washed his hands and went through the sliding double doors to the dining room. Before sitting down he went to the sideboard where the canister set stood and scooped half a cup of flour and a small handful of beans out. He lifted a loose floor board and dumped them into flat cans waiting there between the joists.

Mrs. Feinblatt complained: "You're getting awful queer, Gus. Why do you put the stuff away? Why ask for trouble? They shot the Weisweins fur hoarding, didn't they? And the keifer! Maybe you'll get away with it but my heart stops every time I think of the man looking in the barn, walking over the harrel—Gus, I was talking to Mrs. Potocki in the store when there wasn't anybody around and she knows about it. Gus, did you tell Stan?"

"I told him, I told him," he said wearily. "He's doing the same with his hops. And if your heart stops, your heart stops. Sit down."

She sat.

Gus put on a hat and thought. He was vaguely aware from a novel he had read once that the fifty centuries of Jewish sacred literature provided blessings for every occasion—tasting a perfect melon, seeing purple clouds at sunset, hearing that a relative had been ransomed from heathen captivity. Presumably there was one for sitting down to a thin stew of turnips and beef in the first year of a pagan conquest, but he didn't know it. He sighed and recited the only prayer he did know, the "Hear, O Israel," and they began to eat.

December 5th . . . A mass of cold Canadian air had bulged through the western Great Lakes area, bringing snow mixed with freezing rain to much of the northeastern NAPDR. Hospitals were already filled to capacity with old people coughing their lives away, and they called it virus epidemic. The truth of the matter was that it was cold and starvation.

Betsy Cardew, red-eyed and dog-tired from last night's Young Communist League meeting and the subsequent hours of volunteer work unloading at the freight yards, made her first stop of the day at the Chingwa County Country Club that was. The MVD Agro detachment had plowed it up for an experimental station.

She blinked at a new sign nailed to the archway over the driveway. It said: "Collective Farm 'Pride of Susquehanna' (EXP CC 001)" in ugly Russian-looking letters. She drove under it to the administration building, noting on the way other strange things going on at what used to be the first tee. Red army trucks were arriving. Tents were being erected. Bewildered farm-looking couples were being unloaded from the trucks and guided to the tents. There was a kitchen tent with fat cooks boiling up breakfast; a chow line of farmers was shaping up.

Lieutenant Soblov was waiting for her at the foot of the administration building's steps as usual. He was trying to make her and simultaneously polish his English. He wore the MVD green, but as an Agro scientist he was only nominally in the Ministry of Internal Affairs.

She handed the mail through the lieutenant to him. "What's going on, lieutenant?" she asked.

Sobolov looked around first. The coast was clear. "We are setting up a pilot farm," he grinned. "We are anticipating the problems of next year."

"Problems?"
"After another look around Sobolov ventured an amused laugh. "My dear girl," he assured her, "peasants are peasants, the world over. Surely it can be no secret to you that your countrymen have turned obstinate!"

She looked ashamed. "But our YCL program, 'Every Farmer a Shock Worker of the Revolution.'" — she began to argue.

"Na, na, na! The time is past. There are cycles of behavior, and the secret is to anticipate them. There was first the cycle of shocked apathy, which we countered by occasional salutary executions for the good of all. There is now in effect a new cycle of sullen resistance. Your countrymen think they can — put one over, is the phrase! — on the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics."

He offered her a cigarette and lit one himself. "It is amusing. It is what happened in the Ukraine in 1933. The peasants came out of shock and decided that they would put one over. They neglected to cultivate. They butchered their livestock rather than turn in the stated amount. They raised only enough grain for themselves. How is your history? What did the great Stalin do?" He chuckled affectionately at the thought of the shrewd old man.

"I don't know," she said faintly. "We're working in case on the origins and early heroes of the class struggle in North America—"

"And quite rightly! I will tell you what the great Stalin did. He waited. He smiled and waited. And then in the late fall of 1933, after months of the Ukrainian nonsense, he confiscated all grain and livestock. The foolish peasants died by the millions through the winter. In the spring their broken remnants were easily placed in collective farms where an eye could be kept on them and no foolishness allowed." He dragged deeply on his cigarette and shrugged. "If your countrymen too must learn the difficult way, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics will be a cheerful school-teacher."

"You make it all so clear, lieutenant," Betsy said, and Sobolov smiled proudly.

As she drove on she reflected that the Ukrainians of 1933 had neither a war plan nor a bombardment satellite.

DECEMBER 14th . . . The cold did not penetrate the cavern under Prospect Hill, to Mr. Sparhawk's faint regret. He thought; one really ought to be in that much communication with nature that one was aware of the seasonal cycle, the great rhythm we all echo in our small hurried bodily tick-tocking.

He was serving stewed prunes in the cafeteria to Lieut.-Colonels Byrne and Patri, and he thought it was a good time to tell them about it.

"Share," Byrne said, eating his stewed prunes. He was a small dark man and Patri was a small fair man. They had arrived separately ten days ago, Byrne the pilot comfortably in a telephone repair truck and Patri the bombardier blue with cold after a ride in an unheated freight car and Betsy's unheated sedan.

"Got any more of these prunes, Pop?" Patri asked. He had gobbled his dish. He was getting a little fat, overdoing his catching up on the scanty meals when he was under cover as a mornic paint sprayer in a Detroit auto plant. Byrne, a Tuskegee graduate, hid out as a Black Belt saloonkeeper in Memphis and had missed no meals.

Mr. Sparhawk brought seconds on prunes. "You young men," he said, "really ought to make some time for a study of Zen. Japanese archers, you know, practice Zen, and it makes them the best archers in the world. Qualitatively there's no difference between them — ah — task ahead of you and archery. The great thing is to divorce oneself from the action, not to will. Let the bow shoot the arrow, not the bowman. Now—"

Patri wiped his mouth and got up. "Pop," he said kindly, "we'd be in a helluva mess if we let that thing fly us instead of vice versa."
"Amen, brother," Byrne said. "Just don't you worry, Pop; we'll fly it okay when the time comes. The prunes were swell. I really like prunes."

Mr. Sparhawk should have done the dishes; instead he trailed them forlornly to the hangar room. There they firmly said good-bye and climbed into G-suits. A winning bid descended from the jutting crane arm of Stage I and they hooked on and signaled. It lifted them like two drowned trout on a line, turning and swinging a little, into the dim upper reaches of the cavern. Time for another of their interminable dry runs.

Mr. Sparhawk sighed and buttoned Dr. Dace as the white-haired little engineer hurried past, his arms full of diagrams. Dr. Dace cursed him efficiently for thirty seconds and ordered him back to the kitchen where he was of some use. "And furthermore," Dace snarled in conclusion, "leave my technicians alone, do you understand? There's approximately thirteen hundred man-hours of work left to squeeze in. We're still lacking components. We have no time for your drive!"

Dr. Dace turned and hurtled on his way.

Mr. Sparhawk said a prayer for him and went to do the dishes.

DECEMBER 20th . . . dark and drafty in the Wehrwein's barn at 11.30. The meeting was to begin at midnight. Justin had arrived early to give Hollerith—who used to be Lawson—some bad news.

"It came over the dry wires," he said. "The ticket man got it and passed it to Betsy. She gave it to me in a fake letter. Decoded, no bomb for Chianga County. And—you're reprimanded for requesting one."

Hollerith's face went red in the lamp-light. He struggled with and gave way to the impulse to curse and rail, even in front of a civilian. "I'm supposed to make a fight," he said softly. "I'm supposed to make a fight, and cover the bombardment satellite with fifty farmers, some homemade firecrackers and a few .22's. Those fatheaded—!"

"There'll be the last-minute round-up," Justin said unsympathetically. "And at least we have trucks. And the stuff they're making in the drugstores they don't use in firecrackers."

"How's she making out with the druggists?" Hollerith snapped.

"Winkler's making them. He says he doesn't know how to make nitro, but the fact is he's scared to try in this weather. Farish is going to make nitro."

"Going to make?"

Justin reflected that General Hollerith had been spoiled by having neatly packaged dynamite and TNT to play with too long. "The fact sheet explained all that. . . . It doesn't keep in the cold, general. Turns into crystals

"Tonight you'll be called on to fight," Justin said, "or be shot for cowardice."

and if one crystal gets nicked—wham. End of drugstore. Don't worry. We'll have the stuff unless they blow themselves up making it fresh which I understand is also a distinct possibility."

A couple of men came in and headed for the lantern light.

"Christmas Eve," they said. When the rest arrived the barn began to grow almost comfortable for their body warmth.

Hollerith leaned forward in his gocart and began to speak. "We'll have a report later from each of you on his neighbors," he said. "Tonight I want to make absolutely sure you know what we'll be doing on Christmas Eve. We'll be forcing the Reds to eat their soup with a knife . . ."

II

ON Christmas Eve, December 24th, 8 p.m., Justin was wrinking his face against a drizzle of sleet and pounding on Croley's locked door. The town of Norton was dark.

Mr. Croley's feet eventually sounded on the stairs from his apartment above the store; the door rattled and opened. The storekeeper stood there and Justin said: "Christmas Eve," and passed him a penny.

"Christmas Eve," Croley said.

Justin took out Hollerith's army .45 and stuck it in the storekeeper's ribs. He said: "I need a steady man with a central location. Open your storeroom. I want the local people's guns and ammunition."

Croley shrugged and said: "I'm been 'forced' and walked to the storeroom. He winced when Justin ripped off the Red Army seal, but unlocked the door.

"We load these in your truck, Croley," Justin said. From upstairs came a querulous voice. "Tell her it's all right," Justin said.

Croley called back upstairs that it was all right and, moving like a rusty robot, loaded rifles and boxes of ammunition in his truck outside. He broke silence only once to say: "They'll kill you for this, Justin. Don't be crazy." Justin didn't answer.

The storekeeper's eyes widened when Justin told him to get behind the wheel and drive. "Crazy," he spat. "Check-point on the highway'll see us up the hill. They'll phone the road patrol. Next thing, jeeps and armored cars all up and down the farm roads."

"Don't argue. Just drive. To the Medford place first."

Long horn-tooting brought out the Medfords. In the headlight's glare Justin handed the old man and his sixteen-year-old boy each a good 30-30 and ammunition.

"These ain't our guns, Billy, we just had little varmint rifles, and anyway what's all this—?"

"We haven't got time to sort them out," Justin lied. "We inside. I've a hot meal. A truck'll come by for you."

The boy said joyously: "You mean—"

"Christmas Eve," Justin said. "What did you think it meant?"

At the Lyman's place up the road Henry Lyman was nothing but trouble. First he didn't want a gun. Next he wanted his own gun, not the .22 that was all Justin thought he rated. Lastly he said he wasn't at all sure he'd come when somebody came in a truck for him; he had himself to think about. Justin told him: "Mr. Lyman, you'll be called on to fight for the United States of America tonight. If you refuse to fight, the United States has every right to shoot you for cowardice and every intention of doing so as soon as it has a free moment. Get in your house, have a hot meal and wait for the truck."

"Crazy," Mr. Croley muttered as they drove to the next farm.

AT 9 p.m. on Main Street, Chianga Center, Betsy Cardew slipped into the drugstore by the back way. Bald young Harry Farish, R.Ph., started violently over his prescription counter when she spoke. "Got them, Harry?"

"The nitro, yes. I'm finishing the hermit. There was a surprise inspection before I closed up. Went fine. What's to inspect? Nitric acid and glycerol—standard reagents. In the trash can some rust, some dust and some beer cans." He gave her a thin, terrified smile and went on with his work.

Cappable beer cans stood in a row on his counter. He had filled them with "rust and dust"—iron oxide and powdered aluminum. With deft druggist's fingers he was filling gelatin capsules with barium peroxide and powdered magnesium; into each capsule he slipped a trailing tail of magnesium ribbon. He finished a dozen capsules, slipped them into a dozen beer cans and passed them to Betsy. She had a shopping bag ready for them.

"And the other stuff?"
He took a newspaper from a shelf; beneath it was a flat box partitioned into nests padded with cotton wool. The eggs in the nests were bottles filled with something that looked like yellow oil. Nitroglycerine.

Parish gave her his terrified smile again and said abruptly: "I'm coming along, Miss Cardow. I'll carry—them." He methodically got into his overcoat and wound a scarf around his neck and tucked the padded box under the coat. "Mustn't let them get cold," he said with a near giggle. And—"I used to pitch in the Little League, Miss Cardow. Between attacks of asthma. Maybe . . ." He trailed off.

They went out the back way, she leading with her shopping bag through the dark winter street, he following at a good distance. They were heading for the north end of town, the reservoir and pumping station.

AT 9.15 in the garage of the stellite covers Gus Feinblatt lifted General Hollerith out of his gear and heaved him up into the cab of a red gravel truck. Straps were seen into the leather seat; Hollerith buckled himself in, Feinblatt climbed in and started the motor. It was the signal for fifty hard-core regulars of two weeks' training to start.

Dr. Dace came running to the red gravel truck and called up to Hollerith: "Give 'em hell, general!"

Hollerith, like a good general, boomed with confidence: "The old one-two, Doc!" His eyes were haunted.

He raised his arm and dropped it; the exquisitely counterpoised trap door in the good-but road hoisted up and a drizzle of freezing rain whispered down the tunnel. The trucks began to roll out.

AT 9.30 the two NKVD guards were spacing their slow patrol before the Chuanga Center Pumping Station—a red-brick scaled-down castle with false crenellations and two towers that looked like chess pieces. Behind it the solid wall of the reservoir.

Betsy Cardow and Harry Parish watched from the shadows. Parish's teeth were chattering. "We better not get any closer," he said. "The machine guns on the roof—"

It was about fifteen yards from the board fence where they crouched to the little castle. "They ought to be heavier," Betsy said fretfully. "You should have put them in heavy bottles or wrapped them with wire or something. The pamphlet said that."

"I forgot," Parish said miserably. "I can go back and—"

"No," she said. "There's no time." And she wrinkled her face, trying to think, trying not to cry. The pamphlet assumed the bottles would be heavy enough for a solid throw; the pamphlet assumed the druggist would have nerves of steel and the soul of a punch card, omitting not one step of the twenty it listed. The pamphlet had to assume so, and the pamphlet was wrong. Many things would go wrong that night. Betsy suddenly realized. She stood in paralysis watching the sentries pace, realizing that every mistake would be paid for to the last penny.

"I'm throwing one," she said to Parish.

He eased a small bottle from its nest and pulled off his right glove with his teeth. He went into a rusty windup and hurled the bottle.

It made a very sharp, loud noise that rocked them back and made the board fence ripple against them. It wasn't at all the dull reverberating boom Betsy had prepared herself for but more like the crack of a gigantic whip.

There didn't seem to be a second's pause before the reaction from the pumping-station guard detachment came. Floodlights glared out and in the frosty air they heard clanks from the roof as the section of machine guns was full-loaded and unlimbered. The two guards shouted at each other and crouched, unslinging their Tommy guns and moving right across the little plaza to the edge of the shadow.

The nitro bottle had pocked up the pavement yards from the door. Total failure. The sentries, ready to fire from the hill, were almost upon the fence that sheltered them.

Parish said abruptly: "Good-by, Betsy," which was the first time the bold young man had dared call Miss Cardow from up the hill by her first name. In floodlight filtering through cracks in the fence she saw the silly, terrified grin on his face. He vaulted the fence into the light and cried, his hands up: "I surrender! I give up!"

There was a wild burst of shots from one of the startled guards; they stitched the fence not far from Betsy's head. Through a crack she saw Parish talking earnestly to the guards; his hands up high, they were marching him to the pumping station. She stayed there shivering with the cold for two minutes. If nothing happened she'd have to make a try with her thermite . . .

But there was the shipcrack again, enormously louder this time, and the floodlights went out and fragments rained about her. One brick smashed through the fence like an artillery shell, whistling.

Perhaps, she thought, he swung one of them so they'd shoot, or perhaps he fell forward and broke the bottles next to his chest—or perhaps he repented of the whole thing, perhaps he had been frantically undressing to ease the bottles to a table somewhere and his nervous hand and the cold detonated them all.

She would never know the answer, she thought, but the results were coming thick and fast. Lights were blinking on in windows, the strident ringing of telephones had already begun. Neighbors were calling from porch to porch.

And the reservoir was cracked. It was nothing spectacular. It was just water beginning to rill from the crack in the face, bubbling into the gutters, slopping over a little onto the sidewalks, bubbling and racing on its way through town to the storm sewers of the business section which would convey it harmlessly into the river.

Betsy got up croakily and walked a block into the darkness. She found a big frame house where lights shone upstairs as some family—whose?—chattered about the explosion and wondered if it should call up or go out and see or what. She took a beer can from her shopping bag and snapped her lighter. The twist of magnesium ribbon trailing from the can caught suddenly and with almost explosive violence; burning metal spluttered and seared the fork of her hand. She hissed with the pain and flung the star-bright flare under the big wooden porch. She should have moved on at once. Instead she dubiously watched and wondered. The ignited capsule caught, then, slowly, the iron-aluminum reaction began. In twenty seconds the beer can melted into a puddle of orange-white brilliance that crawled in an amoeboid fashion. The porch flooring above it caught, then the porch posts, then the siding of the house.

Betsy moved on amid screams from windows. At the next block she went down an alley and lobbed a beer can against a smaller house. At the next block she laid one against the foundation of a row of shops and ignited it and walked away, not looking back. Chung's Center was beginning to wake up screaming. The streets were filling with people wearing coats over pyjamas. The fires were spreading, of course, even though the volunteer hose company had come zooming from its garage; there was no pressure at the hydrants. Harry Farish had seen to that. Betsy Cardew became one among hundreds, a dazed-looking woman wandering through blazing streets with a shopping bag in her hand, here and there stopping to do something with a can from the bag.

When she saw a wall of flame ahead of her she knew that Mr. Hosmer, the railroad ticket man, had done his job too, working his way north with the other druggist's thermit. She headed for the post office, her face streaked with tears and soot.

BY 10:45 Justin, in Croley's truck, had met the convoy and passed over the rest of his rifles. There was almost murder done when some of the men saw Croley driving. The old storekeeper put on his accustomed contemptuous silence in the face of their threats. Justin told the men to leave him alone and they almost backed away, but it was Hollerith who acted like a general and saved Croley's life. "You men," he roared at the loudest of them, "are in the army!" In retrospect, thought Justin, it was a silly thing to say. It was even demonstrably untrue; they were bandit-terrorists according to the prevailing law of the land; by a generous construction of the rules of warfare, irregular partisans at the most. But somehow the word army from Hollerith's mouth canceled all that . . .

So it was that Hollerith's truck and Croley's stood abreast at the intersection of the highway and the Norton road, and down the highway gleamed the light in the roadblock that used to be a truck-weighing station. They were waiting for the rest of the convoy to rendezvous, each truck with its load of hastily awakened, hastily armed farmers who knew only that it was Christmas Eve and that their neighbors were telling them: "Fight or die now."

Hollerith was twiddling the dials of a command radio set in the cab of his truck, loot from the cavern. It crackled Russian wherever he turned it. Croley complained to Justin: "My feet're freezing. Whyn't you drive for a spell?"

"All right," Justin said and they shifted seats. Croley stamped his feet against the floor boards and growled: "Damn foolishness. Get us all shot."

Justin said: "If you can't stand the suspense, get out and start running. You'll get shot that much sooner. By me."

Croley was loquacious. "Young snots," he muttered. "What I can't see is a steady man like that Rawson chargin' around. Him you call Hollerith now."

Justin repeated his suggestion. "Don't talk foolish," Croley said testily. "Think I'm a nut? I'll go along. I'll go along with anybody. Doesn't matter who."

And, Justin sensed, Croley did not realize he was degrading himself below the level of mankind to say such a thing, to be such a thing as he was . . .

The sky lightened glaringly to the north, then subsided to a dimmer glow. "General!" Justin yelled. He cranked down his window, reached over and jabbed Hollerith. "Look!"

Hollerith turned from his radio, blinking, and awakened to the north sky. He whipped out a compass, took a bearing on the centre of the lightness. His face broke out into a sunny grin. "Elimira!" he breathed. "Elimira! The air base and the gas depot. No Stormoviks tonight, Billy! They got Elimira!"

"They—what handful of desperately frightened men?—had got Elimira and solved General Hollerith's pressing problem of air attack. And elsewhere? Justin asked.

"The radio's pretty hot," Hollerith said, indulging the civilian situation. "Every command's yelling for Washington, but Washington doesn't come in at all. They should be transmitting in code," he said with a momentary frown. "It's elementary that modern guerrillas will have an RT intercept service. I'm surprised at them."

Justin begged for detail. Hollerith genially translated snatches. "Tank park in Rochester says its vehicles are out—sugar in the gas tanks. Speaking of sugar, did Gribble get off?"

"He got off," Justin said as if to a child. "Betty delivered the uniform, he filled his pockets and away he went. What else is going on?"

"Well, a smug MVD general in New Orleans says the situation's under control, brief and petty insurrection well in hand—but they were supposed to get two suitcase bombs. I wonder who goofed? Never occurred to me that New Orleans would be under the MVD, but I suppose it's only natural. They're a stiff-necked people; it took old Silver Spoons Butler to handle them in the Civil War. And let's see, the Transport Overcommand is pulling rank from Pittsburgh. They want all units to furnish via their own trucks twenty percent of their strength for immediate and vital rail, highway, and harbor repair. And there's some Chinese coming in from the west, but I don't know the language."

"What about the satellite?" asked Justin.

The general said with elaborate detachment: "Not my baby. Couldn't say, Billy." He glanced at his watch. "Where are the rest of the trucks? Billy, run and take a look up Oak Hill Road, see if there's any headlights coming our way. We have to take the blockhouse sooner or later."

Justin saw no headlights.

"I guess they're held up a little," Hollerith said. "Let's go get that road-block now."

Justin was speechless for a long moment. He said at last: "You mean us?"

Hollerith lost his temper. "And just who in hell did you think I meant, the Fighting Sixty-Ninth? I mean us. Feinblatt and I will roll up with our lights on. You and Croley ride in the back. Drop off and walk the last hundred feet. Feinblatt'll gun the motor and I'll keep 'em busy with small talk in broken Russian. Then you shoot 'em from the dark. Croley, you got a rifle? Take my carbine."

"I don't trust Croley," Justin said flatly.

"Billy," said Hollerith, "I've had considerable experience with both turn-coats and reorganizing a war-disrupted area. We're going to need Croley and we can trust him. He'll stay bought."

Croley snorted in the dark. Justin and he got out and climbed into the back of the other truck.

The little raid went like clockwork. The two Russian soldiers, gesticulating in the light, collapsed like puppets with cut strings under the murderous fire of Justin and Croley from twenty feet away.

It was Justin's first personal killing. Like most front-line soldiers of the twentieth century he had done his firing duty in the safety of a machine gun aiming at impersonal specks which usually dropped when he fired, giving him no clue at all as to whether they were killed, wounded or taking cover. He felt sick and shaky. Not so Croley. The old man inspected the two Russians and said, "Dirty skunks."

"You did business with them," Justin said faintly.

"I can do business with anybody. But you think I lied them going over the books, bothering a man all the time? Things are going to be better if we get away from this."

It was as tepid a revolutionary manifesto, perhaps, as was ever spoken. Hollerith was eased down from the truck and into his gocar by Feinblatt and Justin. He muscled himself into the blockhouse and called to Gus to bring the radio in and then stay outside on guard.

"Rank has its privileges," he said, gratefully turning up a kerosene heater. "And I see they had a pot of tea brewing. Croley, pour me a cup and help yourself."

Feinblatt popped in. "Headlights," he said. "It's either our boys or the whole Red Army."

"Detruck them, Billy," said Hollerith. "Get 'em into some kind of formation. Yell 'Attention!' when I come out to talk."

Practically every man in the fifty trucks had gone through military training; there was little confusion. There seemed to be about two hundred gathered by scouring the hills for all men of sixteen and over. Justin got them into ranks grouped on the fifty men who had received some briefings over the past two weeks.

Hollerith's speech went like this: "Christmas Eve. It's here, I'm General Hollerith. And you, my friends, are the Army of the United States. See the sky to the west? That's Chiung Center, burning to the ground. You heard some thunder a while ago? It wasn't thunder; it was the Sasquehanna bridges being blown.

"The Red troops in the Center have got to pull up and march. Their food dumps have been burned. We've destroyed their water supply. We've cut their highway and rail lines so they have no way of getting any more. Right through here is the only way they can march.

"We have to knock out their trucks and kill their commanders. We have to leave them starving, frozen stragglers in our hills where we can kill them on our own terms. They are a regiment—about a thousand of them. There are about two hundred of you. You have rifles and an average of two dozen rounds apiece. For you crowd-shooting, deer-hunting SOBs that should be plenty. Leaders, take your groups and move out."

He wheeled his gocar about and rolled into the blockhouse. Justin followed and closed the door.

The general said, not looking around, in a hoarse whisper: "But will they?"

Justin looked and said: "Sure. There they go. Whooping and yelling, too."

The general said: "They must be nuts," and turned on the radio.

AT 11:30 p.m. in the vehicle park of the MVD detachment in Chiung Center, the man called Gribble was doing the job he had demanded, fought, even brokenly wept for.

The park was the drill field back of the high-school building, and it was in ordered confusion. The vicious incendiary fires lapped at the rim of the field, dying now as century-old houses crumbled into orange-flecked charcoal. A tide of people surged against the field also and was turned back repeatedly by soldiers who clubbed and jabbed with their rifles. Within the line of troops aiming the MVD regiment was forming for motor convoy. Their colonel was doing the obvious, inevitable thing. Without food and water soldiers cannot live; therefore the regiment must go to food and water.

The trucks were ready and waiting.

Somebody shouted something at Gribble; he said, "Da," soiled and hurried on. He was wearing a homemade imitation of the MVD green uniform. The green would never pass by daylight, nor would the linoleum imitations of leather belt and puttees, but it was not necessary for them to pass by daylight.

Gribble was looking for the field kitchen and found it. The cooks, overcoats on top of their whites, were serving tea for the road to the troops; banks of solid black bread and dippers of tea from great boilers. Against the blazing background of the school building the men filed past, one hand out for the bread, canteen cup out for the tea. There were five boilers left when Gribble found the tent; he didn't know how many had already been emptied. As he watched the cooks came to the bottom of one boiler; they yanked it back into the tent and shoved another into place at the serving counter. As he watched the rear fly of the tent was pulled, folded and hurled aboard the mess truck; the tent was disintegrating from the rear under the practiced attack of the cooks. Gribble drifted among them, among the three boilers of tea in reserve, despite their warning shouts. When they were all struggling with a big side fly he impartially sweetened the boilers of tea with white powder from his pockets.

He had morbidly asked about it and learned that the stuff was arsenious trioxide, procured from the remelt shop of Corning Glass.

He wandered off foggly. There was a spark in the fog which wanted him to run screaming to the cooks and tell them he had poisoned the good tea, that they must stop serving it to the soldiers.

He saw them drain the boiler at the counter, haul it back and drag forward the next.

He knew by then that he was a monster. Who but a monster could do what he had done, slaying five thousand devoted scientists and engineers by the simple closing of a door? Now causing the horrible death of how many young soldiers he did not know?

He screamed and began to run away from himself, hurdling into tents, trucks, soldiers. Somebody seized him by the front of his coat and slapped his face sharply; he broke loose and ran again. Then there was a brief interlude under a flashlight during which sharp questions rang in his ears and he could answer them only by weeping.

It ended with a tremendous padded blow on the back of his neck, which was all he felt of the lieutenant's pistol bullet destroying his brain. He never knew hundreds of soldiers squirming themselves settled in the trucks were at that very moment complaining about food as soldiers always do; they said their tea was too sweet.

III

AT 11.30 Justin was establishing the first roadblock in the path of the MVD motor convoy, five miles east of the highway from Chianga Center. Heading a commando of five untrained men and boys whom he didn't know, he steered his truck athwart the two-lane concrete strip and ordered them out. The six of them grunted and strained in the icy night air rocking the truck on its springs, trying to tip it over. It swayed farther and farther with each shove; on the twentieth it almost heeled but then crashed back solidly on its four wheels while the six men stood panting and beaten.

"Lights," said a sixteen-year-old boy named Sheppard. The aura of headlights was just becoming visible over a rise to the east. They scrambled for the roadside and into the brush about ten yards.

"Remember what I told you," Justin whispered. "Don't look at their headlights at all. Officers first. When they come after us, fall back and snipe the main body of the convoy."

"Yeah," the Sheppard boy whispered, fascinated.

The aura of light became beams and then blazing pairs of eyes. "Don't look," said Justin.

The lights snugged out fast when they picked up the truck. The advance guard—it was six jeeps—knew a roadblock wasn't a roadblock unless it was defended. By starlight and a little moon the commando saw MVD men scrambling out and flattening on the road. One soldier talked loudly into a radio before getting out. Justin discovered that he couldn't tell insignia.

"Forget what I said about officers," he said. "Fire and fall back, then west."

He aimed into a clump of three men who were belly down on the road, peering off the roadside and whispering. At least one had to be an officer or noncom giving orders. He fired six shots from his carbine; at the range he couldn't miss. All three men floundered and yelled.

Around him blazed the rifles of his men, firing at what he didn't know.

A command in Russian from the road and the MVD men uncertainly began to fire in their general direction; somebody had seen muzzle-flash from one of the old guns. The bullets whistled above them (people fire high in the dark) except for one that stopped with a meaty chuck in young Sheppard's head. Justin scooped up the boy's varmint rifle and box of ammunition.

"Fall back," he said. They clustered tight behind him, trampling and talking until he cursed them. He headed right, guided by glimpses of the white road in starlight seen through ragged trees until there were the brighter lights of the convoy to guide them. They had stopped on radio word from the point, but had not yet blacked out. Justin fell farther back into the woods, saw the black hump of a little rise and crawled up it on his belly.

"Don't fire," he whispered. "Something's going on."

One truck was emptying; that would be a platoon sent forward to reinforce the point and get the truck off the road. In the headlights half the platoon seemed to be drunk; they were lurching and holding their stomachs. Justin could barely make out features when they swayed across a headlight's beam. They were in agony, and Justin knew what it meant. Gribble had made it with his white arsenic. Good-by, Gribble, insurance executive, security officer, hatchet man, poisoner, child of self-torment . . .

Some men were hanging from the other trucks, vomiting.

"Fire off your rounds," Justin said. "Officers and noncoms. Then we get out of here and back to the roadblock." They spread out along the rise and began to squeeze off careful shots. Justin fired four times at a shouting, waving captain and missed all four times. Grinding his teeth he hurled his carbine aside and blazed away wildly with young Sheppard's .22, just before the convoy lights went out he dropped his man.

They had lost their night vision watching the convoy; they stumbled and crashed their way east along the roadside until it slowly returned. They heard shots behind them and then machine-gun fire. It was probably another commando sniping the convoy from its left flank and getting worse than it gave.

They hugged the roadside passing other roadblock trucks, some successfully toppled, on their way back to the weighing-station commando post.

Justin went in and told Hollerith: "We lost one man and wanted a lot of ammunition but our truck stopped them temporarily five miles out of town. Gribble got through with his sugar; my guess is one man in four affected."

"Good," Hollerith said. "Have some tea."

Justin gulped a tin cup of scalding tea from the top of the kerosene heater.

"What about the satellite?" he asked. Hollerith said tightly: "One man said he believes he saw it take off at 11.45 but he wasn't certain. I was busy at the time."

One of the trained men came in, wild-eyed and bleeding from a crudely wrapped wound in his left hand. "Hi, Lawson," he said. General Hollerith looked annoyed. "We got there second," the man said. Some other gang was banging away and they blacked out. They fired at us a lot and a machine gun killed both my brothers. With the same burst."

"What did you see?" Hollerith urged.

The man rambled: "They looked sick, lots of them. They unloaded a lot of their men and their medics with the bands and a lot of blankets. Left 'em right there in the road and the trucks moved on up with their lights out and soldiers out beating the bushes on each side of the road."

"That's fine," Hollerith said quietly. "About five miles an hour in low gear?"

"That'd be about right," the man said. "Did I tell you they killed James and Henry? My brothers."

Hollerith said: "Have some tea, Hanson. Take it outside with you." He nodded to Justin who put a mug of tea in the man's unwounded hand and gently steered him from the little house. Hanson sat down and began to cough. Justin walked away when the cough turned into sobs.

THERE were headlights coming down Oak Hill Road off the highway. The car made the turn and headed for the command post, stopping a hundred feet away. Justin didn't know how he knew, but he was sure it was Betsy. She was so stained and bedraggled and silent; she carried a bulging shopping bag. He took her in to Hollerith. She laid down the shopping bag carefully and began to unpack it on the general's table. She said: "Winkler had a sudden rush of courage. He met me at the post-office garage with this stuff. Extra thermit he turned out and some nitro in flat bottles."

"The satellite was launched at 11.45!" Could they still wreck the Red convoy?

"How's the Center?" snapped Hollerith.

"Still burning, I guess," she said listlessly. "What about the satellite?" Hollerith said in a low, venomous voice: "To hell with the satellite. How am I supposed to know about the satellite? Maybe it's crashed in Nebraska or the Atlantic by now. Maybe it never got up. Maybe it's on its way into the sun. I'm no mind reader, Miss Cardew, so kindly shut up about the satellite."

Stan Potocki came in and looked apologetic. "Gus got killed," he said. "One of their patrols tossed grenades when they heard us. Blown in half—but I guess you want a report. The convoy is proceeding east on the highway under blackout with flank patrols. They are stopping from time to time to move our roadblocks. They are averaging maybe three miles an hour I figure because their walking patrols aren't having any trouble keeping up. I don't know whether our sniping's having any real effect on them except to kill a few of their people. They're going to get through, general."

"Thanks, Potocki," Hollerith said. "We've got some stuff here for you to lay in their path. It's nitroglycerine; handle with care. Mass all these together; maybe we can crater the road. Put it where one of our roadblock trucks'll run over it when they move it. And send in anybody outside who wants a job."

Two exhausted men came in; one saluted shamefacedly. Hollerith gave him the thermit bombs. "Take these to the top of the old Lehigh cut. They're incendiaries; you just light them. Got matches? Here, take mine. You ought to get some fine results from dropping them into open personnel trucks."

The man grinned, took the shopping bag and left. "Young Joe Firstman. They killed his father a few days ago." Hollerith told Justin in an aside. "To the other man he said: 'Take those dinner plates out of that cabinet there. Yes, that's what I said! I want you to lay 'em face down in the road between Truck Six and Truck Seven.'"

"Aw," the man said incredulously.

"Listen," Hollerith said patiently. "I mean what I say. It'll cost them ten minutes and thirty men if our shooting is any good. They'll see them, they'll know they're plates and still won't dare roll over them until their bomb-disposal men have come up and removed them. Is that clear?"

"I guess so," the man said doubtfully, and took the plates and went out. "Five to one he goofed off," said Hollerith looking after him dimly.

Mr. Sparhawk entered and came to a heel-clicking, palm-out British salute before Hollerith. "Sir," he said, "I have the honor to report that the satellite vessel was launched at 11.45 hours. Dr. Dace said that all appeared to be well on radar track. He instructed me to take a recon car and report."

"Thank you," Hollerith said. "Now everybody be quiet and let me think. Very shortly the Reds will decide they won't be made to eat soup with a knife. They'll pull in their flank guards, turn on their lights and go barreling through, taking their losses and consoling themselves with thoughts of coming back and killing us bandit-terrorists an inch at a time. I think they'll reach the decision at about oh-oh-one-five. Justin, sound the recall, check the wind and give 'em gas."

Justin went outside, Betsy trailing after, and cranked a siren on a truck loaded with long cylinders from the satellite cavern. "Betsy," he said, "this stuff is chlorine. I'm going to drive east to the cut about three miles from here. If the wind is right, I open the valves for the Red convoy to run into a cloud of the stuff. Will you tail me in your car so I can hop in and get back here? By then the command post will be dismantled and we'll all be heading for high ground."

"All right," she said.

IV

ON Christmas morning at 12.30 a.m. General Hollerith, Justin, Betsy, Mr. Cruley, and Mr. Sparhawk were in Sparhawk's recon car on the ridge road with a view of the chlorine-filled cut below.

"I was right," Hollerith said abstractedly. "Here they come."

With headlights on, the convoy was rolling eastward at fair speed. Into the chlorine.

It was easy to imagine the hellish confusion below. Headlight beams angled crazily as drivers found themselves scorching over their sbeds; in the trucks dazed soldiers must have been scratching wildly under useful blankets, mess gear and overcoats for long-forgotten gas masks. Some trucks hurtled into the walls of the cat. But slowly, slowly, the convoy reformed and limped on.

Hollerith was swearing under his breath. At last he said: "We didn't smash them locally." The radio in the recon car squawked in Chinese. "What's happened elsewhere we don't know yet. Compared to what I privately expected, it's been a howling success. If it could be followed up—but of course it can't be followed up. It was a one-punch affair. If the Reds had broken and scattered it would have been . . ." He sighed. "But they're going to make it through to Rochester or Syracuse or wherever they're headed, and they'll regroup and . . ." He sighed again.

The radio switched from Chinese to Russian. The general's head snapped sharply toward the speaker and he said at last: "That was it. English next."

The radio said: "M.S. One to Earth. To the peoples of Russia and China. This is Military Satellite One of the United States Armed Forces broadcasting. We hereby deliver the following ultimatum: Your occupation troops in North America must surrender within twenty-four hours. Repatriation of North American prisoners of war must begin within twenty-four hours. Unless these demands are met the cities of Moscow and Peiping will be destroyed. If the demands are still not met within a further twenty-four hours the cities of Leningrad and Hong Kong will be destroyed. If our demands are not met, we shall continue destroying Russian and Chinese cities at twenty-four-hour intervals until our stock of hydrogen weapons is exhausted. We shall then drop cobalt bombs on Russia and China which will wipe out all life in those areas. Peoples of Russia and China, make your voices heard while you can. It is your rulers alone who condemn you to certain death if they refuse our ultimatum."

The voice switched to Chinese again. They stood in utter silence through a complete replay of the ultimatum in three languages. The general reached out at last and gently turned a switch and the radio fell silent. "That will do it," he said softly. "Feng and Novikov are stubborn, but when their cities begin to go they'll come around—or be deposited by rulers who will come around."

"So it's all over," Betsy said wonderingly.

Hollerith's face was a mixture of bitterness and defiant pride. "No," he said. "We've got to start work on people immediately. They mustn't make that mistake, not over. It isn't over and it'll never be over. What happens next is, the Reds build a bombardment satellite of their own—secretly, in spite of all the controls we clamp on them. I'll take them a few years. We use these years to build a better satellite that'll shoot them out of the sky—but they'll know that, so theirs will be armed and steerable . . . don't ever think it'll be over. There's always going to be work for people like me."

Sparhawk was down on his knees talking quietly: "Deliver me O Lord from the evil men, preserve me from the violent men which imagine wickedness in their hearts; continually are they gathered together for war . . ."

Justin noted that he was praying not to Anne Besant or the Zen Patriarchs or to Vishnu but to the God of his Sunday school and regimental worship. He wondered if somehow the past night had burned away a great deal of worldly nonsense from Mr. Sparhawk's brain and left the pure metal of worship.

"Croley," General Hollerith was saying, "this is where you come in. We now have hell's own problem of supply and housing. I suppose I'm the government hereabouts now, but I'm going to be a very busy man making the Reds decent prisoners of war, not turning into bandits and scavengers. I'm going to delegate food supply to you; you know rationing procedures from your business and you know where and who the jobbers and wholesalers are. Think you can handle it?"

"Might," said Croley.

"Billy," the general said, "you're a good man and we need you. You can be my right arm in this prisoner-of-war roundup deal or you can work with Croley here getting the food lines in operation again—what's the matter?"

Billy Justin, once a commercial artist, thirty-eight years old, a pensioned veteran of Korea, for years a dairy farmer and one year a conscript, trigger man of the weapon that held Earth hostage, newly and suddenly seeker of God, said over his shoulder to Hollerith: "Nothing's the matter, general. I just decided I couldn't work with you or Croley. No offense, I hope."

He knelt beside Mr. Sparhawk, who was praying: "Put up again the sword into his place for they that take the sword shall perish from the sword. Ye lust and have not; ye kill and desire to have, and cannot obtain; ye fight and war because ye ask not . . ."

They stared at Billy Justin but after a while Betsy came and joined him. ★

THE END